83. The Committee members unanimously welcomed the choice of Conventions Nos. 87 and 98 for the 1994 General Survey, particularly given that this year represented a double anniversary of special importance to the ILO. The principles of freedom of association, consecrated in the ILO Constitution and the Declaration of Philadelphia, along with tripartism, were the cornerstones of the ILO's action and its policies. These instruments were among the most ratified and, as further proof of their importance, even member States which had not ratified them could be called to explain before the Committee specially established to this end by the Governing Body of the ILO. For the Workers' members and several Government members (Finland, Germany, Netherlands), the fundamental principles contained in these Conventions were the prerequisites to the establishment of any appropriate machinery for industrial relations. The Government members of South Africa and of Guinea stated, in particular, that these Conventions constituted the primary source of inspiration in the elaboration of their legislation in this area.

84. The Workers' members and the great majority of the Government members emphasized the independence, objectivity and impartiality demonstrated by the Committee of Experts in the elaboration of this General Survey which extended and, in many ways, completed the previous General Surveys on the subject. They expressed their conviction that, due to its high quality and exhaustive nature, this General Survey would serve as a reference text for several years to come, whether it be to promote the ratification of the Conventions or to improve their application, or even with respect to training activities. The Workers' members noted with satisfaction that, even if the two Committees had different mandates and working methods, the Experts had taken into account the work of this Committee, as they clearly stated that they had endeavoured to respond to certain questions and concerns which it had previously expressed. The Government member of Venezuela associated himself with these remarks.

85. The Employers' members, while subscribing to most of the comments of the Committee of Experts, expressed a certain number of reservations, in particular with respect to the chapter on the right to strike. Without calling into question the General Survey, the Government members of Belarus and of Portugal also expressed several nuances with respect to this question.

86. A wide consensus emerged in the Committee on the need for the universal application of standards on freedom of association, the respect of which could not be subordinated to the achievement of a certain level of development or to a political or economic situation. The Government member of Namibia emphasized in this regard, however, the dilemma faced by countries who had to yield to the requirements of international financial institutions and donor countries, which often were not easily reconcilable, and were even incompatible, with international labour standards; for example, when an economic recovery and structural adjustment plan — and the obtaining of financing — resulted in massive dismissal in the public service and drastic cut-backs in education and health services. In these circumstances, the question of free collective bargaining and the application of standards did not even come into question.

87. The Workers' members and several Government members emphasized that the survey was rightly placed within the context of the recent political and economic changes which had occurred. As regards political upheaval, while it may be true that important progress had been noted in the process of democratization, the Workers' members nevertheless recalled that there were still autocratic regimes in the world in which the only democratic thing was the name; one had to remain vigilant, therefore, because free and democratic workers' and employers' organizations made up an essential component of any true democracy. As concerned the new challenges raised by the globalization of the economy and the intensification of competition, the Workers' members considered that an updating was required by a strengthening of the functioning and the impact of the ILO as well as the fundamental principles being attacked. The survey satisfactorily responded to this need. In the opinion of the Employers' member of the United States, however, some passages of the survey gave the impression that the Committee of Experts considered that Conventions Nos. 87 and 98 would in some way be protected from the upheavals occurring in the world of work, whereas the implementation of ILO standards could not be disassociated from national and global economic realities; just like the employers, the workers had to adapt to the changing conditions. While acquiescing to the need to adapt, the Workers' members could not accept that this would result in a weakening of their organizations and the collective bargaining systems developed over the years.

88. The General Survey noted a significant number of cases of progress achieved in the application of these conventions, which was highlighted by several Government members, as well as the Employers' and Workers' members. The latter recalled, however, that many serious problems of practical application, in fact as in law, existed in several parts of the world, as could be seen by the Reports of the Committee on Freedom of Association. Several Workers' members stressed the particularly serious situation prevailing in Latin America in this regard. The Workers' members of Colombia and of Guatemala recalled that the progress noted at the legislative level was not sufficient if not accompanied by a true political will to translate the spirit of the law into practice. Furthermore, the Workers' members and, in particular, the Workers' member of New Zealand mentioned that the recent adoption of the Contracts of Employment Act gave rise to serious violations of freedom of association and of free collective bargaining.

89. The Employers' members and several speakers from the two other groups recalled that the Committee of Experts' comments on the principles of freedom of association applied both to workers and employers. The latter would, therefore, have hoped that this equality of treatment had been mentioned more systematically in the survey. Furthermore, employers' organizations needed massive assistance with respect to training, particularly in the countries of Central and Eastern Europe where they had not previously been in a position to play their true role. The ILO could make an important contribution in this regard. The Workers' member of France, indicating his agreement on this last point if it was a question of finding interlocutors for trade unions, nevertheless specified that the ILO should never finance activities which would hinder the formation of workers' organizations or lead to their disappearance.

90. The Workers' members expressed great interest in the measures that the new Government of South Africa indicated it would take to follow the recommendations made by the Fact-Finding and Conciliation Commission, particularly with respect to freedom of association. The Government member of South Africa stated that his Government recognized without reservation the jurisdiction of the Fact-Finding and Conciliation Commission and its obligations under international law, and undertook to bring its laws into line with them. The public and agricultural sectors were now covered by labour legislation and a draft Bill concerning the so-called autonomous territories should be adopted shortly: then all of the country would be covered by a single industrial relations scheme. A process of tripartite consultation had begun with respect to the right to strike, an issue which might be resolved between now and next year.

91. The Workers' members expressed their complete agreement with the views of the Committee of Experts on the subject of a world social platform. This would be the first step towards the setting up of a truly human work scheme in all nations, an objective mentioned since 1919 in the ILO Constitution. Indicating that his Government did not yet have a definitive position on the advantages of including a social clause in international trade agreements, the Government member of the Netherlands expressed his opinion that the Conventions on freedom of association could play a role in this regard if such clauses were to be included. The Employers' member of the United States on the other hand felt that the extensive interpretation given by the Experts to these Conventions, as illustrated by the right to strike, represented one of the obstacles in their use in a social clause. He considered that the principle of freedom of association should be greatly simplified, perhaps to one sentence, to be implemented in any meaningful way in a trade regime. The Workers' members said that they had some difficulty reconciling this last argument with the fact that the Employers' members had really only criticized the chapter dealing with the right to strike, restricting themselves only to some reservations in respect of specific aspects. In these circumstances, reducing the principles of the Convention to one single sentence in a social clause would be a far too simplistic approach.

92. The Employers' member of the United States, supporting the observations made by the Employers' members, recalled the degree to which it was important that the observations of the Experts on the meaning and scope of Conventions Nos. 87 and 98 were well understood and accepted, precisely because of the central nature of these instruments to the work of this Committee. As everyone knows, this Committee functions for the most part on the basis of consensus. However, this ability is seriously impaired when one or the other group disagrees with the Experts' observations. This is particularly critical with respect to the formulation of conclusions on specific cases and the adoption of special paragraphs. This need for consensus is particularly acute in cases involving freedom of association. For the most part, this has not proven to be a problem except when the issue involves the right to strike.

General introduction of the General Survey

93. The Employers' members recalled the conditions which prevailed at the beginning of the industrial era, when democracy was still in its infancy in a number of countries; various groups had to struggle then to defend workers' and employers' interests. Even if there had been a considerable evolution since then, some forms, even the terminology used, had been conserved. It might therefore be useful to carry out a re-examination of this question. The General Survey set forth the diverse sources of rights which had emerged over the years and the different international instruments which contained various provisions on the question of freedom of association. The existing texts in the area, however, only contained brief principles on the subject. It was therefore not surprising that the introductory chapter of the survey did not really address the content of the standards in question, but rather confined itself to an assessment of how these standards had been interpreted and applied over the years by the different supervisory bodies called to handle them. This sometimes gave the impression that one of these bodies was being called upon to lay down the law. Of course this was not said directly, because none of these bodies had that competence. The survey drew a number of conclusions, not only on a series of fundamental principles, considered by the Committee as a veritable international law of freedom of association, but also on a number of minutely detailed points.

94. The Workers' members emphasized that the General Survey came at a crucial time for social policy in general and for the ILO in particular. Due to the globalization of the economy and the recent political changes, workers' and employers' organizations, as well as the public authorities, were facing new challenges, numerous and important. These diverse factors unified and strengthened each other: primarily, the result was a generalized intensification of competition which should be counterbalanced by international rules. The ILO and its fundamental principles, tripartism, freedom of association and free collective bargaining, had always been considered the cornerstones of a universal social and economic framework. These principles were also the fundamental objectives during the creation of the ILO in 1919 and its strengthening in 1944. The challenges which must now be met required updating in the sense of a strengthening of the functioning and impact of the ILO. The General Survey, which the Committee of Experts had rightly placed in the present context, met expectations and was a very current and usable frame of reference. The survey would have beyond a doubt a profound influence on the future action of all the supervisory bodies. The Workers' members also noted with satisfaction that the Committee of Experts had taken into account the work of the Conference Committee on Standards, as had been announced already in paragraph 3 of the survey, even if these two committees had a different mandate and different working methods. The Committee of Experts had replied unambiguously to the numerous observations based, in particular, on some provisions of the Vienna Convention or on other texts or legal theories.

The relationship between trade union rights and civil and political liberties

95. The Employers' members generally supported the comments of the Committee of Experts on this subject, but with certain nuances. The beginning of this chapter, which in particular made reference to other international texts, lent to the observation that sometimes, in practice, there was some opposition between individual rights and collective rights, whereas that should not normally be the case. The right of every person to establish and join organizations was the very foundation of freedom of association. The comments and recommendations of the Committee of Experts on this subject concerned the fundamental rights and liberties which every citizen should be able to invoke, worker or employer, who wishes to join an organization and participate in its activities. For the Employers' members, respect for these principles was the indispensable prerequisite for the existence of a state of law respectful of democratic rules. For a number of years, this Committee had recalled that the violation of civil liberties had negative repercussions on freedom of association. The Committee had the duty to draw attention to the regrettable situations of this type when they occurred and to request the necessary changes. There were a number of difficulties in this respect and the ILO and the employers should continue to cooperate in order to resolve them. These substantial problems which were raised in the course of this discussion, as a rule lay well outside the subtleties concerning the right to strike, and indeed had nothing to do with it. The real and recognizable difficulties, obstructions and shortcomings concerning freedom of association in its practical application formed an important field of action for the supervisory bodies of the ILO. There was considerable agreement on this subject, constituting a base for effective action in this field and this opportunity should not be lost. The differences of opinion about the limits of strikes should not be allowed to imperil the general measure of agreement. However, controversial matters needed to be discussed at somewhat greater length than questions on which there was agreement.

96. For the Workers' members, collective rights gave rise to harmonious development and the reinforcement of individual rights. There was therefore a veritable complementarity between the two. Furthermore, freedom of association was a principle the consequences of which reached far beyond the framework of labour law in the classic sense of the word. In the absence of a democratic order respecting political rights and freedoms, freedom of association could not fully develop in all its aspects. Convention No. 87 and the constitutional principles of freedom of association, which must be respected by every State whether or not they have ratified the Convention, imposed an obligation of result on the authorities responsible for the police, as well as for the administration of justice and the for the judiciary power. The public authorities must not remain complacent by simply tolerating the existence and the functioning of workers' and employers' organizations; they must create and maintain all the necessary conditions so that these organizations may develop, without interference, within the framework of a true political, social and economic democracy. Each year during the discussion of the individual cases, however, the Committee noted that legitimate trade union activities were considered as criminal offences in some countries and that they were suppressed by the authorities or even by paramilitary groups acting with complete impunity. The Workers' members also stressed that it was particularly important that an independent, easy accessible, judiciary system be established — a subject which it would be desirable to provide for in a specific international instrument — and that the victims of this type of repression could thus obtain compensation for the prejudices caused.

97. The Workers' members also deplored the very serious attacks on freedom of association which were the result of measures taken in certain countries, for example, the internment of trade union activists in "education through labour" camps, who were thus forcibly integrated into a parallel economy which exported products and services around the world. The Workers' members of Colombia and of Guatemala moreover underlined the deplorable situation prevailing in their countries and in several countries in Latin America, as could be seen by the number of cases of violation of fundamental rights brought before the Committee on Freedom of Association. The Workers' member of New Zealand also gave resounding homage to the workers who had been victims of serious violations of fundamental rights simply for having wanted to defend freedom of association, and sometimes losing their life for it. The Workers' member of France stressed the utility and the effectiveness of the ILO supervisory machinery which had, for example, contributed to the setting up of truly free and democratic trade-unionism in Poland.

98. Several Government members (Finland, Portugal, Uganda) endorsed the views expressed by the Committee of Experts on the necessary link between civil and political liberties and trade union rights. The Government member of Germany agreed with the Workers' members that the situations described in this part of the survey were particularly disturbing.

The right of workers and employers to organize

99. The members of the Standards Committee of the Conference stated that they were generally in agreement with the comments of the Committee of Experts on this question. Several reservations were however expressed concerning the issue of trade union security.

100. The Workers' members indicated on a general level that the possibility, in fact as in law, of establishing trade union organizations was an indispensable prerequisite to the proper functioning of freedom of association and free collective bargaining. If the recent process of democratization had given rise to progress on this point as compared with the situation in 1983, there were nevertheless a series of measures and practices in a number of countries which hindered, sometimes openly, the right to organize for workers. The desire to obtain a competitive advantage, to perpetuate a not very democratic control over workers, the explanations based on the so-called obsolete nature of international standards or even the economic and cultural differences, were some of the reasons invoked by different countries and really constituted excuses more than true arguments.

101. The Workers' members subscribed to the position of the Committee of Experts according to which the only exceptions provided for in Convention No. 87 were the armed forces and the police; in case of doubt, workers should be considered as civilians and thus benefit from the protection of this instrument. These principles were also valid for all other workers who, in many countries, were refused trade union rights, for example: public servants, fire-fighters, prison staff, agricultural workers, workers in the informal sector, managerial staff, workers in export processing zones, migrant workers, etc. The Workers' member of Argentina furthermore drew the Committee's attention to the specific difficulties encountered by seafarers because of the greatly increased use of flags of convenience and second registers in such a way as to deprive an important group of workers of any of the protections of international labour conventions, in particular, in the area of freedom of association. This problem should be remedied by the ILO.

102. According to the Workers' members and the Employers' members, the right of workers and employers to establish organizations should not be hindered by unduly complex and long registration procedures which did not offer all the guarantees of necessary objectivity and which, in practice, amounted to a system of previous authorization. The Workers' members indicated that these problems were particularly serious in systems of enterprise trade unions because of the necessity to register each time, as well as in the free export zones, a problem raised many times in the General Survey. Moreover, several free trade unions, established recently or for a certain number of years, were also facing obstacles in countries which applied a system of semi-official trade union monopoly, and even official, in favour of a union close to the political power.

103. As concerned the right of workers and employers to establish organizations of their own choosing, the Workers' members commented on three points. First, in systems of enterprise trade unions, many workers were deprived of the right to organize when legislation imposed an excessive threshold as to the minimum number of members. This situation was worsened by the increasing number of small and medium enterprises and the greater recourse to subcontracting. The second important theme concerned the relationship between, on the one hand, trade union diversity and, on the other, the requirements of effectiveness and feasibility in collective bargaining at all levels. The bilateral and tripartite social dialogue could not be limited only to the enterprise, but should be held at every level and deal with every facet of social and economic policy. An excessive multiplication of workers' and employers' organizations, like a trade union monopoly imposed by law, ran the risk of weakening the quality of the social dialogue and damaging the members' representation. The balance to be found depended to a large extent on the particularities of the labour relations system in each country. The Workers' members also underlined that maintaining this balance, particularly in systems of centralized negotiation, might become difficult when trade unions by category, such as managers, claimed recognition as the most representative trade union at the national and federal level. Thirdly, the survey confirms that the clauses and practice of trade union security were not covered by the Convention. Given that these clauses were often criticized by governments which had adopted an anti-union policy, it was not surprising that the trade unions concerned looked to protect themselves by using clauses of this nature.

104. The Government member of Iceland stated that his country and many other States were concerned about several problems raised with respect to Convention No. 87 such as closed shop systems, trade union security clauses and the notion that it was worth calling up the negative side of freedom of association. Governments were often confronted with a dilemma in this regard: on the one hand, they try to guarantee trade union security by allowing the social partners to negotiate on priority employment clauses, particularly when the employment market is restricted and fragmented as in Iceland; on the other hand, they are expected to neutralize the negative aspects of freedom of association by prohibiting trade union security clauses. This question was equally linked to the search for greater flexibility in the labour market, as well as to the desires to substitute individual labour contracts for collective agreements, a tendency which was reflected in other regional instruments. The Committee of Independent Experts of the European Social Charter had for its part considered that article 5 of the Charter covered both positive and negative freedom of association and that trade union security clauses were in violation of the Charter. The European Court of Human Rights arrived at the same conclusion with respect to article 11 of the European Convention on Human Rights, without determining however if this negative right should benefit from an equivalent protection to that given to the positive right. This gave rise to the thought that the latter, in certain circumstances, might benefit from better guarantees.

105. Supporting the general observations of their group, several Workers' members also remarked on the specific situation in their own countries with respect to the comments of the Committee of Experts on this subject. Thus, the Workers' members of the Czech Republic and of Japan evoked specific problems concerning the right to organize for public servants or certain workers in the public sector, for example fire-fighters or prison staff; the Committee of Experts had now clarified this question. The Workers' member of Senegal stressed that workers, particularly in French-speaking Africa, were often refused functions of responsibility in unions because of distinctions based on nationality even though they enjoyed popular support from their constituents. The unanimous position of the Committee of Experts on trade union monopoly had now been consecrated, as was underscored by the Workers' members of Poland and Spain, the former specifying that Convention No. 87 had undoubtedly furnished powerful arguments for the Solidarity union in its struggle for the recognition of truly independent trade unions. The Workers' member of Norway, speaking on behalf of the Workers' members of Denmark, Finland, Iceland and Sweden, firmly supported the conclusions of the Committee of Experts on the questions of trade union security. They pointed out, however, that a contradictory jurisprudence on this subject might develop between the ILO and the European bodies.

106. The Employers' members remarked that, overall, the Committee of Experts repeated the comments made previously on this subject, for example concerning persons who could not be refused the right to associate because of the occupational category to which they belong, their nationality or their civil status or even the absence of preference for political reasons. The survey did not insist enough, however, on the fact that the guarantees under Article 2 of Convention No. 87 applied with as much force to employers. Other subjects such as the system of previous authorization existing in some countries, the conditions of registration equivalent to previous authorization, as well as the trade union monopoly imposed by legislation, had been discussed at length in previous years; the opinions of the Committee of Experts and this Committee in this regard were sufficiently clear and in agreement that it was not necessary to add to them.

107. The Employers' members nevertheless expressed serious reservations with respect to the differentiation made by the Experts between trade union security clauses freely negotiated and clauses imposed by legislation. This differentiation, which was perhaps no longer a true differentiation, was far too complex. If this reasoning were accepted, pressures through collective bargaining would be acceptable but not by state regulation. Reservations were necessary in this regard because there were countries where collective bargaining produced the same effects as legislation. The Employers' members thus did not see any real difference between the factual pressures and those exercised by legislation: for the individual the result was the same whether the pressure came from workers' organizations, employers' organizations or the State. In the opinion of the Employers' members, there was a logically obvious link between the freedom to join an organization and the freedom not to join. Freedom required the possibility to choose among several options and the freedom not to join was an inalienable part of the guarantee for freedom. The Employers' members considered that on this point, the Committee of Experts did not follow the principle retained in paragraph 55 of the survey wherein it applied the principle that exceptions to a basic rule should be interpreted in a very narrow sense.

108. The Employers' members of Iceland and Romania, supporting the general observations of the Employers' spokesperson on these questions, made additional observations. The Employers' member of Iceland, referring to comments of her Government and the Workers' member of Norway, stated that the questions concerning trade union security clauses and the right not to associate were more complex than the General Survey implied and that further discussion was necessary with respect to paragraph 102. She had difficulty understanding in this context the difference between laws and collective agreements, particularly when the latter were extended to all workers by law and not only to those directly concerned by the agreements. The problem was aggravated in Iceland by the fact that the law required employers to deduct union dues from employees' salaries: it was difficult in these circumstances to speak of voluntary association of workers. To require, either directly or indirectly, people to join a union against their will was not reconcilable with the basic principle of the right to organize, nor with modern notions of personal freedom. In this regard, the Employers' member of Romania was also surprised by the fact that, according to his interpretation, the Committee transformed a right - which must be protected - into an obligation, and this under the guise of trade union security favouring trade union monopoly. According to him, the comments of the Committee concerning the deduction of dues at the source, for unionists as well as non-members, were contrary to Articles 6 and 9 of Convention No. 95 on the protection of wages, and the comments concerning the obligation of non-members to pay equal contributions to union dues in order to benefit from collective agreements were contrary to Paragraph 4 of Recommendation No. 91 on collective agreements.

109. Stating that the considerations made by the Committee of Experts in this chapter seemed relevant, the Government member of Portugal rectified the reference (paragraph 81, note 71) to provisions of Portuguese legislation concerning the minimum membership required for establishing a trade union, since the ratification of Convention No. 87 had brought about the abrogation of all contrary texts. The services responsible for the registration of trade unions no longer applied the Legislative Decree in question.

110. The Government member of Uganda indicated that his Government, with the technical assistance of the ILO, was undertaking a complete reform of all labour laws and that, for the first time, the social partners had been fully associated with this exercise. In particular, the Government enacted the Trade Union Amendment Legislation to extend trade union rights to workers who did not previously benefit from them, for example the civil service, teaching service and those in the Central Bank.

111. The Government member of the Czech Republic specified that the legislation of his country respected the Convention with respect to the rights of public servants; a draft Bill, considered to be in conformity with Convention

No. 87 and with several provisions of Convention No. 151 (not ratified by his country) is to be submitted to Parliament after consultation with the trade unions.

Drawing up of constitutions and rules, elections of representatives, organization of administration and activities

112. The members of the Standards Committee of the Conference were generally in agreement with the comments of the Committee of Experts on this matter.

113. The Workers' members, stressing the primordial importance of the autonomy of organizations, observed that it was remarkable that the countries which had very detailed regulations with respect to the functioning of trade union organizations often paid very little attention to social policy. Noting, as in the survey, that much progress had been made in this area, they encouraged these countries to pursue this policy in order to bring their legislation into total conformity with the principles of freedom of association. Furthermore, the Workers' members stated that they completely shared the firm and explicit position of the Committee, based on the preparatory documents of the Convention and also taking into account the context of globalization, when the Committee confirmed that trade union activities could not be limited to strictly occupational concerns. Workers' organizations should thus be able to voice their opinions on political issues in the broad sense of the term and, in particular, to express their views publicly on a government's economic and social policy.

114. For the Employers' members, the Committee of Experts had overall formulated appropriate observations on the application of these provisions of the Convention, even though they could not subscribe to its position in every detail; most of these observations did not therefore call for specific remarks. They observed, however, that the Committee of Experts had undertaken a delicate subject when commenting upon the question of the political activities of trade unions. The opinion put forth by the Committee in this regard seemed plausible but it was not strictly speaking deduced from the provisions of the Convention. The question of whether, and to what extent, workers' and employers' organizations should have political ties should be treated with a great degree of caution. If, as the Experts seemed to suggest, trade unions could intervene in any debate of this nature, it might become difficult to distinguish them from political parties. This would only result in the other political forces, which were perhaps stronger and more influential, inevitably considering them as competing political parties.

The right to strike

115. On the principle of the right to strike, a broad consensus was expressed in the Standards Committee. The Employers' members nevertheless specified that, according to them, the text of Conventions Nos. 87 and 98 did not include the right to strike and expressed their disagreement with the scope given to this right by the Committee of Experts. Some Government members expressed some reservations with respect to the public service.

116. The Employers' members made detailed comments on this question, clearly stressing on a number of occasions that they did not challenge the principle of the freedom to strike and lock-out, but they absolutely could not accept that the Committee of Experts deduced from the text of the Convention a right so universal, explicit and detailed, as it had done in this part of the survey.

117. Almost all the chapters began with a relevant passage of the Convention. This could not however be the case on this point since strike was not mentioned either in Convention No. 87 or in Convention No. 98. Furthermore, the survey placed a great deal of emphasis this year on the historical aspects of these instruments; this historical method of interpretation however was only of secondary importance since, in the first place, must come the text, the purpose and the meaning of the provisions themselves. There were no concrete provisions and it was not helpful to quote the standards contained in the instruments of other organizations where strikes and collective action were sometimes mentioned in another context and in a very general or only indirect manner.

118. The beginning of the chapter rightly indicated that the right to strike was mentioned during the preparatory work, but adds in paragraph 142 that "... during discussions at the Conference in 1947 and 1948, no amendment expressly establishing or denying the right to strike was adopted or even submitted." The Employers' members however quoted the following passage: "Several Governments, while giving their approval to the formula, have nevertheless emphasized, justifiably it would appear, that the proposed Convention relates only to the freedom of association and not to the right to strike, a question which will be considered in connection with Item VIII (conciliation and arbitration) on the agenda of the Conference. In these circumstances, it has appeared to the Office to be preferable not to include a provision on this point in the proposed Convention concerning freedom of association." (31st Conference, 1948, Report VII, page 87.) A similar conclusion was made in the plenary sitting: "The Chairman stated that the Convention was not intended to be a 'code of regulations' for the right to organize, but rather a concise statement of certain fundamental principles." (31st Conference, 1948, Record of Proceedings, Appendix X, page 477.) Later, Recommendation No. 92 on voluntary conciliation and arbitration dealt with this issue in a neutral manner without regulating the contents. During the plenary sitting, the famous Workers' spokesperson, Léon Jouhaux, bitterly complained of the unsatisfactory result of the discussion; he did not explicitly mention the absence of the right to strike, but other delegates did. Moreover, during the adoption of Convention No. 98, two requests presented by Workers' delegates with the aim of including a guarantee of the right to strike were rejected on the basis that it was not covered by the proposed text and that this question should be dealt with at a later stage. (32nd Conference, 1949, Record of Proceedings, Appendix VII, pages 468 and 470; see also ILO, Industry and Labour, Vol. II, July-December 1949, pages 147, et suite.) Shortly afterwards, a Government delegate made the same request which the chairman declared unreceivable for the same reasons.

119. Under these circumstances, it was incomprehensible to the Employers that the supervisory bodies could take a stand on the exact scope and content of the right to strike in the absence of explicit and concrete provisions on the subject, and that this absence seemed precisely to be the justification for their position, as is suggested in paragraph 145. The Committee of Experts had put into practice here what was called in mathematics an axiom and in Catholic theology a dogma: that is complete, unconditional acceptance of a certain and exact truth from which everything else was derived.

120. Article 3 of Convention No. 87 which confers to organizations the right "to organize their administration and activities and to formulate their activities" did not mean, according to the Employers' members, the right to intervene in the rights of others. In paragraph 136, the Experts rightly stated that "the exercise of this right inevitably affects third parties who sometimes feel that they are the victims in disputes in which they have no part". This assertion of the Committee's had been increasingly confirmed with respect to all labour disputes. In any event, strikes were clearly not an internal and autonomous matter of a trade union; they were above all directed against employers and, in today's world with its division of labour, the effects of a strike which were regularly and deliberately calculated increasingly touched third parties and the general public who had nothing to with this conflict. Sympathy strikes, by their very nature, were aimed at people who were not directly involved in the conflict. The interpretation of the Committee, which was creating and developing law, did not allow for the conclusion that the right to strike was an intrinsic corollary of the right to organize, as asserted in paragraph 151 of the survey.

121. The Employers' members also felt it important to note that they were not so much criticizing the fact that the Committee of Experts wanted to recognize the right to strike in principle, but rather that it took as a point of departure a comprehensive and unlimited right to strike. The views of the Committee of Experts on the various forms of strike and their scope were obviously based on erroneous premises. The Committee did not generally examine whether strikes were permissible, nor the question of how far a strike can go. Beginning with the erroneous premise of an unlimited right to strike, the Committee considered rather whether limitations on the right to strike were permissible. According to the Committee, any limitation on the right to strike required a specific justification, which could be seen in the treatment of all the important cases. Two examples could be given in this respect: the public service and political strikes.

122. According to the Employers' members, the Committee of Experts considered that restrictions on strikes in the public service were only allowable if the strike affected the essential services, an expression which the Experts later defined in the strict sense of the term. Consequently, the Committee came to accept restrictions on the right to strike only in cases where the strike might endanger the life, personal safety or health of whole or part of the population. The Employers' members had already responded in this respect that a State could not accept that its duty to protect the welfare of its citizens be restricted to the values of life and health. It can be seen that, in paragraphs 158 and 159, the Committee of Experts had applied a different approach by adopting a very cautious formula. The Committee considered that some restrictions on the right to strike might be permissible under certain circumstances, while leaving the question open. One might discern the sign of a new approach but, looking at the specific application of this approach to concrete examples concerning some countries, one quickly realized that the Committee had fallen back on its old formula, hurrying to forget its weak attempt at revision.

123. Still according to the Employers' members, the position of the Committee of Experts with respect to political strikes had also been influenced by the above-mentioned principle of unlimited strike. For a long time, the Committee only admitted the possibility of limitations for "purely" political strikes. However, the number of cases where the Committee applied this approach demonstrated that purely political strikes virtually did not exist since it had often assimilated political strikes to a protest against government policy, a form of strike which it had always considered acceptable. The Employers' members expressed their concern for the fact that, from this point of view, consideration was never given to the fact of a democratically elected parliament and yet, the social partners were not above the law. Regrettably, the Committee of Experts often considered that some strikes were a protest against the government, while in reality, these strikes were against decisions of a freely elected parliament. In these circumstances, it would seem more reasonable and in greater conformity with democratic rules to submit the question of strike and lock-out to the legislator of the ILO, i.e. the International Labour Conference, where, after sufficient preparation and an open debate, this area, which was still open, could be made the subject of a specific regulation.

124. In their final remarks on the right to strike, the Employers' members, in response to some comments from the Workers' members, recalled that they were not simply set on denying the right to strike, but had, to the contrary, put forward numerous and well-founded arguments for their position. First, the Employers' members had made recourse to historic arguments, the basis of which was disputed by some workers, precisely because the survey itself placed a great deal of emphasis on this. Basing themselves on these texts, the Employers could thus demonstrate that the right to strike had not been provided for in Conventions Nos. 87 and 98. This argument was all the more convincing by the fact that the right to strike had not been forgotten during the elaboration of these instruments: attempts had been made to incorporate this right into the Conventions but had been rejected in the absence of a majority in favour. Secondly, several speakers simply asserted that there was a comprehensive right to strike because there had to be, as without the right to strike, there could be no freedom of association. It was impossible to seriously argue against this type of preemptory statement which likened the right to strike to a sacred workers' right. Thirdly, numerous speakers cited other regional or international instruments dealing with the right to strike, lock-out, etc., but these were not relevant to the interpretation of ILO instruments. An extensive right to strike did indeed exist in some countries, but elsewhere the situation was entirely different. This was a matter for national law, but in no way was it a right established by ILO instruments or derived from them.

125. As regards the statement of the Workers' member of Poland that Conventions should be interpreted in a dynamic and functional manner, the Employers' members saw in this an admission that there was no legal basis for the right to strike in ILO instruments. There were rules of interpretation in international law provided for by Articles 31 and 32 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties which the Experts themselves used in their interpretations. Two objections were raised in this regard. First, the Vienna Convention dated back to 1969 and banned retroactivity. In Article 4 of this Convention, however, it is said that this ban on retroactivity did not apply to general rules of international law, and the rules of interpretation in Articles 31 and 32 of the Convention were such rules. Secondly, Article 5 of the Vienna Convention provided that it "applies to any treaty which is the constituent instrument of an international organization and to any treaty adopted within an international organization, without prejudice to any relevant rules of the organization." There were no rules of interpretation in the constituent instrument of the ILO and article 37 of the Constitution only indicated the competent body without establishing authentic rules of interpretation.

126. Finally, with respect to the statement made by the Workers' member of the United Kingdom according to whom even if the standards did not contain detailed provisions on the right to strike, this right was generally and implicitly recognized, the Employers' members stated that this argument was not enough as no rule of international law could be derived from it upon which the situation in every member State could be examined and, if necessary, criticized. There must be more precise provisions in order to conclude the existence of a right. Nevertheless, the Experts have gradually and systematically elaborated not a general principle on the right to strike — as they should have done — but rather an almost unlimited right to strike, accepting less and less any restrictions on this right. If the views of the Committee of Experts were generally accepted, then workers should no longer have any objection to placing this mater on the agenda of the Conference, thus clarifying the question. The Employers' members, however, were quite certain that the final result would not be the type of right to strike elaborated by the Committee of Experts.

127. Supporting the comments of the Employers' spokesperson, the Employers' member of the United States observed that, considering the legislative history of these Conventions and the observations of the Experts in the 1950s, no one could have anticipated the extremely explicit and detailed interpretation now made by the Committee of Experts. The speaker recalled that, in the 1953 survey on Convention No. 87, the Committee stated that: "The object of this Convention is to define as concisely as possible the principles governing freedom of association, whilst refraining from prescribing any code or model regulations." (ILC, 36th Session, 1953, Report III, Part IV of the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations (articles 19 and 22 of the Constitution), page 57.) The Committee asserted however in paragraph 13 of the 1994 survey that all of the principles which it applies constitute "a veritable international law of freedom of association". This flew in the face not only of the 1953 statement but also of what it rightly stated in paragraph 20 of the 1994 General Report: " ... ILO instruments, whether new or revised, set minimum standards (article 19, paragraph 8, of the Constitution). As a matter of principle, Conventions should set a general framework."

128. The speaker recalled that, in making observations regarding the application of ratified Conventions, the Committee of Experts normally based itself on the text of the convention and its legislative history. With respect to Conventions Nos. 87 and 98, however, the Committee had moved away from this practice and also applied the principles of the Committee on Freedom of Association. By endorsing the conclusions of the Committee on the meaning of these Conventions, the Committee of Experts has subverted the supervisory machinery. No less an authority than Mr. Nicolas Valticos had pointed out that the conclusions of the Committee on Freedom of Association were not limited to determining the meaning of the freedom of association Conventions and that, not being bound by the terms of these Conventions but more generally inspired by the principles of freedom of association, the Committee was led to formulate the principles which on various points extended the express provisions of the Convention. This reliance on decisions of the Committee on Freedom of Association, decisions which went beyond anything contemplated by the provisions and legislative history of these Conventions, undercut the credibility of the Committee of Experts, a credibility which remained vital to the effectiveness of the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards.

129. The speaker noted that, when the right to strike was discussed in the Standards Committee of the Conference, a confusion arose between two distinct questions which it was worth distinguishing. The first is whether trade unions have the right to strike; on this point, there is a general unanimity, although the right to strike was not without limits. The second question, more relevant to this Committee, is the following: do Conventions Nos. 87 and 98 include the right to strike and, if so, to what extent? Everyone would agree that the right to strike was not explicitly provided for in these instruments. The Committee of Experts indicated in paragraph 142 of the survey that the right to strike "... seemed to have been taken for granted in the report prepared for the first discussion of Convention No. 87 ..." and that "during discussions at the Conference in 1947 and 1948, no amendment expressly establishing or denying the right to strike was adopted or even submitted." Even if correct, these were quite slim reeds for the Experts to rely on as a basis for its extensive regulation of the ability of governments to place limits on the right to strike given the fundamental nature of such a right. Besides the fact that this document was prepared by the Office, the legislative history of Convention No. 87 was unequivocally clear that "the proposed Convention relates only to freedom of association and not to the right to strike". Furthermore, as was emphasized by the Employers' spokesperson, during the final discussions of Convention No. 98 in 1949, the Conference Chairman declared unreceivable the two amendments aimed at incorporating a guarantee for the right to strike as they were not within the scope of the Convention. The speaker thus expressed the opinion that the passage in question constituted a factual error with respect to the historical basis of the right to strike being fundamentally inherent to these Conventions.

130. The speaker recalled that the Committee of Experts mentioned the right to strike for the first time in its third General Survey on the subject in 1959, in only one paragraph and only with respect to the public service. In the following surveys, the Committee gradually expanded its views on the matter to seven paragraphs in 1973, then 25 in 1983 and finally arriving in 1994 with a separate chapter of no less than 44 paragraphs, including a number of new subjects.

131. Underlining that the Experts stated in paragraph 145 that: "In the absence of an express provision on the right to strike in the basic text, the ILO supervisory bodies have had to determine the exact scope and meaning of the Conventions on this subject", the speaker stated that the Committee of Experts' function was to interpret existing provisions and not to substitute for legislators; it is not up to the Experts to create requirements with respect to questions upon which the technical committee could not agree. To base oneself on the part of Article 3 which states "Workers' and Employers' organizations shall have the right ... to organize their ... activities and to formulate their programmes" is a very indirect and subjective method for concluding the existence of the right to strike in Convention No. 87. It was also a surprising method, as it concerned a right as fundamental as the right to strike which one would have expected to find as an express provision in the text of the Convention itself.

132. The speaker stated that, given the silence of the two Conventions on the right to strike, it would be better to substitute a more pragmatic approach for the optimal approach taken by the Experts whereby the Conventions would only be concerned with general prohibitions to the right to strike rather than the finer details of whether the strike involved essential or non-essential services or whether public servants exercised authority in the name of the State. Noting that the Experts seemed to have chosen a more pragmatic approach in paragraph 160 on the question of strikes in essential services, in response to the wishes expressed for several years by the Employers' members, they considered that this determination was made on a case-by-case basis and not according to the almost uniform approach mentioned in the 1983 survey (paragraph 214, footnote 3) frequently used in the past.

133. Moreover, the speaker remarked that this year, for the first time, the Committee of Experts has addressed the issue of replacing strikers. The speaker indicated his concern that the Committee make such an observation in the abstract, particularly when it was based on two decisions of the Committee on Freedom of Association, the conclusions and recommendations of which were less strict than the observation of the Experts in paragraph 175 since the former only found that there was risk of a derogation of the right to strike. This observation of the Committee of Experts, which might be raised within the framework of the controversial, political debate taking place in the United States, was not appropriate, especially if one considered that it involved only a small aspect of a balanced and complex system of industrial relations.

134. In reply to criticisms of the attitude attributed to the Employers' members concerning the ILO, standards and the support given to the supervisory bodies, an attitude which had allegedly radically changed according to some Workers' members, the speaker, supporting the general comments made by the Employers in this regard, recalled that it was not the Employers who had tried to destroy the ILO system but rather some countries. The Employers, to the contrary, had always supported the system and muted their concerns in the general interest.

135. The Employers' member of Nicaragua added that the right to strike should only be exercised after all other recourse foreseen for resolving conflicts had been exhausted. According to the Employers' member of Romania, the Committee of Experts sometimes made interpretations which contradicted provisions of other standards adopted by the ILO and the exercise of the right to strike could interfere with other rights just as fundamental.

136. The Workers' members stated that the right to strike was an indispensable corollary of the right to organize protected by Convention No. 87 and by the principles enunciated in the ILO Constitution. Without the right to strike, freedom of association would be deprived of its substance. It was enough to go through the preparatory works of Convention No. 87, the multiple conclusions and recommendations of the Committee on Freedom of Association and the successive general surveys elaborated by the Committee of Experts on this subject to be convinced of this. In its 1994 survey, the Committee of Experts formally and unambiguously confirmed this relationship by dedicating a separate chapter to the principles and modalities of the right to strike which it placed in the current context: growing interdependence, globalization of the economy, fragmentation of enterprises and the obsession of competitiveness. The Experts also established current and operational orientations, not only for this Committee, but also for all governments and all workers' and employers' organizations.

137. The Workers' members pointed out that, as indicated in paragraph 165 of the survey, strike objectives could not be limited only to the conflict linked to the workplace or the enterprise, particularly given the phenomena of enterprise fragmentation and internationalization. This was the logical consequence of the fact that trade union activities should not be limited to strictly occupational questions. Moreover, this enterprise fragmentation was partly due to the social policy of many governments to provide various advantages to small and medium enterprises; there was a danger in this weakening of collective rights if certain precautions were not taken, as mentioned in paragraph 335. This was the reason why sympathy strikes should be possible, as well as strikes at the sectoral level, the national and the international level.

138. The Workers' members also stressed that account had to be taken of all of this context when considering the question of modalities for carrying out strikes, such as picketing or occupation of the workplace. Often called upon to make this judgement, the judiciary power had a tendency to suppress these forms of strike, whereas it should do everything possible, if the judicial system in the country permitted, to ensure respect for international obligations and the ILO Constitution. The Workers' members also invited the Governments to verify whether the legislation, practice and jurisprudence of their countries were in conformity with the principles enunciated in paragraph 174 and, if not, to take the necessary corrective measures. As indicated in paragraph 137, detailed and restrictive legislation would not stop wildcat strikes and unorganized actions. By considerably limiting the scope of action of trade unions by legal or administrative restrictions, governments and employers might find themselves increasingly faced with spontaneous actions.

139. According to the Workers' members, possible restrictions on the right to strike in essential services and for certain categories of public servants should be restrictively defined given that they are exceptions to a general rule concerning a fundamental right. The Workers' members strongly hoped that the nuanced position thus expressed by the Experts would put an end to the controversy which sometimes hindered the work of this Committee. In paragraphs 161 and 254, et suite, the Experts rightly emphasized the need to give full priority to negotiated solutions.

140. In their final observations concerning the right to strike, the Workers' members reiterated their general agreement with respect to the approach adopted by the Committee of Experts and commented upon the observations made by some speakers. First of all, they noted that the Government and the Employers' members accepted the principle of the right to strike. The reservations expressed concerned not the right to strike but rather the modalities and the extent to which national conditions should be taken into account. Secondly, most of the reservations expressed by the governments only concerned the right to strike in the public service, considered to be a restrictive interpretation. Thirdly, expressing their surprise at the fact that the Employers' members relied on a declaration of a Workers' delegate to the 1949 Conference, the Workers' members expressed their preference for the method used in the General Survey and the examination, in particular, of legislation and practice in order to evaluate the real situation in the field. Fourthly, they stated that a new discussion at the Conference, as suggested by the Employers, of an essential aspect of a fundamental Convention dealing with human rights as Convention No. 87 did, was not a good idea. Such a discussion might paralyse tripartism and the ILO just at the time when the ILO should be developing dynamic action. As concerned the suggestion of the Employers' members to entrust to the legislators of the ILO, i.e. the Conference, the care to set the modalities of the right to strike, the Workers' members recalled that a draft resolution on this point had been introduced at an earlier session of the Conference by the Government of Colombia, a country which was experiencing very serious problems with respect to the application of Conventions Nos. 87 and 98, including before this Committee. On the other hand, the Committee of Experts unanimously, all the Workers' members and a large majority of the Government members were of the opinion that effective protection of freedom of association necessarily implied operational rules and principles concerning the modalities of the right to strike.

141. The Workers' members also rejected the position of the Employers' member of the United States according to whom the inclusion of Convention No. 87 as such in a social clause would not be opportune. They emphasized that the Employers' members really only criticized the substance of one of the ten chapters, expressing only some reservations on certain aspects of the rest of the survey. The simplifying of the freedom of association Convention into one single sentence in a social clause would not, therefore, make much sense.

142. As concerned the observations of the Employers' members and, in particular those of the Employers' member of the United States, on the changes occurring in the world and the need to adapt to them, the Workers' members were fully aware of this but they could not accept that these changes would weaken workers' organizations and the collective bargaining systems put into place over the years. On a related point on the discussion concerning the relationship between individual rights and collective rights, the Workers' members indicated that they did not dispute the practical importance of individual rights for workers, but nevertheless stressed that collective bargaining and collective rights in general were a very important source of rights for the promotion of the development of individual rights. If on the one hand they were in favour of a strengthening of certain individual rights, for example equality of opportunity, occupational training, family leave, etc., they were opposed, on the other to an individual approach which would tend to weaken collective bargaining.

143. Numerous Workers' members spoke to support the general observations, to emphasize specific aspects of this part of the General Survey or to draw the Committee's attention to the situation prevailing in some countries. All endorsed without reservation the approach adopted by the Experts concerning the interpretation of Article 3 on the right to strike. Thus, the Workers' member of Poland underlined that the Committee had only applied well-established principles, Convention No. 87 calling for a dynamic and functional interpretation. According to the Workers' member of Germany, if the Employers recognized the principle of the right to strike, it was not logical that they contest the means used by the Committee to interpret this principle. The Workers' members of the Netherlands and the United Kingdom stated that the Experts had developed their views on this question in a very cautious, gradual and balanced manner, with the support of a majority of the Conference Committee; it was preferable that the general consensus established in this regard not be shaken up. Recalling that strikes were an essential means of defending the economic, social and occupational interests of workers, the Workers' member of France particularly called into question the position of the Employers on sympathy strikes, emphasizing that there were problems of solidarity generally and that trade union structure was often interoccupational. Furthermore, he criticized the use made by the Employers of the declarations on strikes made by a Workers' member in 1948 and the exaggerated dramatization of the consequences of strikes. The real solution was not to give any reason for going on strike. Several other Workers' members also pointed out various forms of attack on the right to strike, for example: provisions making strikes a criminal offence, frequent limitations imposed on public servants, abuses with respect to the determination of minimum services.

144. Several Government members, including Finland, Germany and Venezuela, expressed general agreement with the Committee of Experts' position on strikes as an indispensable corollary of freedom of association and emphasized moreover that the Committee had explained that this was not an absolute right. According to the Government member of Venezuela, the Committee of Experts had only adopted the modern rules of interpretation of general legal standards by preferring a more flexible and dynamic interpretation to a literal and dogmatic one, taking into account not only the text, but also its precedents, in the context of its adoption and the changes which had occurred. It would have been surprising if a right so broadly accepted had been rejected by the ILO for a restrictive interpretation. For the Government member of Germany, if the authors of the Convention had not considered that the right to strike was a part of freedom of association, why would they have considered it necessary to specify that the recognition of trade union rights for public agents did not prejudge the question of their right to strike? (See 30th International Labour Conference, 1947, Report VII, page 109.)

145. Several Government members, in particular the Government member of Germany, stressed that the problems in this respect often related to the public service, since in that case the employer was the government.

146. The Government member of Belarus, recalling that Conventions Nos. 87 and 98 did not expressly cover the right to strike, stated that this right was always exercised even if it did not appear in national legislation. The legitimacy of this right had to be appraised with respect to the consequences that its exercise might have for society, limiting these consequences as much as possible. A legal framework had to exist therefore, strike being only one of the means for resolving conflicts, and its exercise should be limited to such circumstances. In cases where the consequences of strikes had effects beyond the enterprise, the government might have to take measures and prohibition of the strike in such cases was conceivable.

147. Agreeing that the right to strike was truly an essential corollary to the right to organize, the Government member of Portugal expressed, however, some doubts about certain developments in the survey concerning for example: the exercise of the right to strike in the public service, the maintenance of employment relations, sympathy strikes or strikes protesting against social and economic policy, procedures for strikes, lawful forms of strike action, sanctions in the case of illegal strikes and minimum services. In order to consider the principles put forward by the Committee of Experts as rules of international law, the Conference would have to adopt them according to the principle of tripartism. If a Convention were to be adopted, would all the rules elaborated by the Committee have to be included? Would States which had ratified Convention No. 87 adhere to the new standard?

148. The Government member of the United States indicated that the President of her country had stated that he would sign a law prohibiting the replacement of striking workers. The legislative amendments had been adopted by the House of Representatives and were presently under consideration by the Senate.

Dissolution and suspension of organizations federations and confederations

149. The Workers' members stated that the measures for dissolution and suspension of organizations examined by the Committee in Chapter IV of the survey were extreme forms of interference which should be condemned because the authorities could use them at any time in order to paralyse the trade union movement. The simple fact of their existence had the same effect as the sword of Damocles wavering above the organizations. Judicial recourse, when it existed, was often ineffective due to its sometimes slow and complicated nature and did not always offer guarantees of the necessary independence and objectivity. Other problems had recently arisen with respect to the division of the property of trade unions closely linked to the political system in place within the framework of an institutional trade union monopoly with the aim of equitably redistributing its supporters among the free and democratic trade unions. This redistribution should be organized as soon as possible and on an equitable basis. The Workers' member of Poland endorsed the position of the Committee of Experts on this point, stating however that it might have extended its scope — which essentially aimed at Central and Eastern Europe — to all the countries in Africa, Asia and America which have moved from a single party system to a pluralist democracy. He was of the opinion that the Committee could have emphasized more firmly and explicitly that the Convention placed an obligation on States to take such measures, after necessary consultation, as had been recalled by the Commission of Inquiry established to consider the complaint concerning the application by Romania of Convention No. 111 on discrimination (employment and occupation). He underlined that the absence of appropriate measures in this regard in numerous countries on the road to democratic reform represented one of the worst threats to the existence and functioning of independent trade unions.

150. As regards the restrictions placed on the right of organizations to join federations and confederations and to affiliate at the international level, the Workers' members stated that measures of this type were clearly designed to weaken the impact of the trade union movement and to undermine worker solidarity. Trade union organizations were thus trapped within a framework imposed by the authorities. Among the possible multiple consequences of this, they mentioned: the danger that trade union activities be restricted to strictly occupational matters concerning the workplace; the limitation of the scope of application of collective agreements and of social policy; the exclusion of certain categories of the population; the immobility and ignorance of workers faced with the increasing internationalization of the world; the danger of political control over the trade union movement; and finally, the weakening of tripartism at the national, regional and international level.

151. The Employers' members expressed their general agreement with the comments made by the Committee of Experts in these two chapters.

Right to Organize and Collective Bargaining
Acts of discrimination and interference

152. A fairly broad consensus developed in the Standards Committee of the Conference concerning the comments made by the Committee of Experts on Convention No. 98. The Employers' members and some Government members expressed, however, some reservations or nuances.

153. The Employers' members stated that the principle of protection against anti-union discrimination was clearly indicated in Article 1, paragraph 1, of Convention No. 98. Article 1, paragraph 2, illustrated this principle with examples; there was no doubt in this regard. On the other hand, the manner in which this protection had to be ensured was not so explicitly defined (which was not mentioned by the Experts) since the Convention limited itself to indicating that it must be "adequate". Several of the Experts' reflections on this point were understandable, but they were not directly derived from the Convention. The States therefore had a great deal of discretion in this regard. An excess of detail concerning protective measures could give the impression that it was an exhaustive list; measures not included might not then be taken into account. The term "adequate" was thus preferred in the Convention because of its flexibility. In this way, it could be interpreted and applied differently with respect to different legal systems.

154. As regards protection against acts of interference, the Employers' members emphasized that the Committee of Experts did not have any objection to the principle that employers may contribute to the financing of trade unions (paragraph 229) but did call into question the independence of solidarist associations. According to the Employers' members it was sometimes difficult to distinguish between the two. Mutual trust between the employers' and workers' organizations was a sign of a solid social partnership but, unfortunately, the relationships between organizations were often described as a long line of relentless conflicts, using the language of the class struggle, whereas this was an image of the past in several places in the world.

155. The Workers' members stressed that the exclusion of public servants in Convention No. 98 had to be restrictively interpreted. The number of individual cases in which the Standards Committee of the Conference discussed this question demonstrated the importance of the problem which was also raised within the context of privatization.

156. As concerned acts of anti-union discrimination, they recalled that effective protection during the period of employment, including termination of the employment relationship, was an essential aspect of the right to organize. Convention No. 135 completed these provisions with respect to workers' representatives. The Workers' members insisted that it was not enough for governments to tolerate unionism at the national or international level, but rather workers' organizations should have available to them all necessary means for the development of trade union action and dialogue through the intermediary of their activists and of their members. Regrettably, numerous governments and employers had the tendency to consider the presence of unions in the enterprise as a plague, whereas they should be accepted as true partners because of their ability to structure, coordinate and mobilize which were important qualities in the development of a good human resource policy and the creation of a climate of trust. The practice and the examples given in the survey demonstrated that protection against anti-union discrimination left much to be desired in many countries which could usefully be inspired by the constructive recommendations of the Committee of Experts.

157. As concerned protection against acts of interference, the Workers' members stated that it was illusory to hope for a free and autonomous functioning of trade union and employers' organizations if there was interference between them. The numerous complaints concerning employer interference in trade union affairs in several countries illustrated the scope of the problem. In some countries, this interference was even preached as official policy. It was encouraging to note that some progress had been made in one country with respect to solidarist associations, but the problem still existed in other places. Several Workers' members, in particular those of the Czech Republic, Guatemala, the Netherlands and Senegal, evoked the problems, sometimes extremely serious, which arose in this regard in their own countries or those of other member States. This was particularly the case when armed forces and police intervened, sometimes openly and with the endorsement of the authorities, in labour disputes and in workers' affairs generally. This situation could not be tolerated, even if this type of intervention was not specifically prohibited by the Convention.

Promotion of collective bargaining

158. The Workers' members insisted on the fact, that under the terms of Convention No. 98, it was not enough to tolerate collective bargaining; its promotion implied a positive attitude, no matter what system was in force. The Committee of Experts made an interesting suggestion with the system of framework agreements which would enable the strong points of several systems to be taken advantage of at the enterprise and sectoral level as well as even the national and supranational level. This system allowed for reconciliation, on the one hand, of common orientations in negotiations, the protection of workers in unorganized enterprises and sectors, such as service sectors or part-time workers or those who have limited contracts, and decentralized bargaining on the other.

159. According to the Workers' members, the direct or indirect interference by the public authorities in collective bargaining in order to maintain competitive positions had become a major problem. Measures of this type taken at the national, international or even supranational level, such as the Council of Ministers of Finance of the European Union (ECOFIN) went against the principles of free collective bargaining. The reminder of the Committee of Experts on this point was extremely important. While supporting these general observations, several Workers' members described the numerous and serious problems with respect to collective bargaining in their own countries or in other member States. In this respect, the Workers' member of Argentina recalled the annulment of collective agreements by decree, and the Workers' member of Senegal pointed out the specific problems arising from the devaluation of the CFA franc.

160. The question of the tendency towards individualization of labour relations to the detriment of the structures and machinery for collective bargaining was also raised by several Workers' members, in particular those from New Zealand, Spain and the United Kingdom. The latter indicated that, if trade unions were prepared to adapt to any change resulting, in particular, from globalization, workers were not on the other hand ready to accept changes which aimed specifically at altering the bargaining power of unions. Perhaps it should be asked whether the so-called need for flexibility was actually a natural competitive force or rather a device to reduce the bargaining power of unions. To the extent to which the provisions of the Conventions aimed at balancing the positions of the parties, they should be respected. True economic prosperity could only last if everyone who contributed to it could share in it equally. The Workers' member of New Zealand pointed out that the Government and the employers had put into place an industrial relations scheme aimed at destroying trade unions in the large sectors of the labour market, particularly those in which the working conditions were the worst. Turning to paragraphs 297 to 318 of the survey, she indicated that the recent Employment Contracts Act, which seriously increased the inequality between the power of employers and of employees, had begun to seriously erode collective bargaining.

161. The Employers' members, emphasizing that governments had a wide scope of appropriate promotional measures to choose from, stated that they did not share the concern of the Committee of Experts with respect to the tendency to reinforce individual rights over collective rights and the privatization of public enterprises. In industrialized countries, the only ones affected by this tendency, the age of collective thinking and regulation seemed to have come to an end. It was not a question of measures handed down from above, but rather a movement accompanying the evolution of contemporary tendencies which favoured increased autonomy and individualism. This did not mean that there would no longer be any collective bargaining or collective agreements, but their content would certainly change. ILO standards would have to adapt to the new situation by becoming more flexible in order to allow for greater differentiations depending on certain economic criteria. Supporting these observations, the Employers' member of the United States added that he had great difficulty understanding the Experts' comments on the dangers to collective rights because of measures, legislative or otherwise, favouring individual rights. Unions and other citizen groups in his country supported measures of this type.

162. The Employers' members supported without reservation most of the other observations made by the Experts in this chapter which showed that it was difficult to adopt a balanced position between the constraints arising from free negotiations on the one hand and the account given to national and global interests on the other. It was clear that, in the view of the Experts, freedom to bargain collectively was not unlimited as they recommended that the authorities try to convince the parties to take into account the interests of society and of the State. This should logically mean that, if the parties did not follow this advice, the Convention would permit certain restrictions on collective bargaining.

163. The Government member of Iceland, noting the complaint against his country submitted to the Committee on Freedom of Association, stated that a correct application of these instruments, particularly Convention No. 98 often created problems for governments. Governments had special responsibility for economic development which lead them sometimes to have to react quickly to prevent an economic crisis and massive unemployment, particularly when the economy depended upon one single activity, as in Iceland. The policy of his Government was nevertheless one of respect for its obligations under Convention No. 98 and of letting the social partners negotiate wages and other conditions of employment.

164. The Government member of the Czech Republic also pointed out the difficulties faced by governments which were sometimes called to intervene in the process of collective bargaining in order to maintain the stability of the macroeconomic environment and to keep inflation at a reasonable level. His Government recently had to decide to take such exceptional measures for the limited duration of the privatization process, in order to preserve the national economic interest.

165. The Government member of the United States pointed out that her Government had established three independent tripartite groups with the responsibility of reviewing the complex structure of labour management relations and to make recommendations for changes to the legislation and practice to facilitate the process of organizing and of collective bargaining in both the public and private sector. Administrative changes to the National Labor Relations Board (NLRB) were also being considered to ensure fair rules with respect to labour management disputes.

Highlights. Ratification of Conventions.

166. Most of the members of the Committee noted the increase in ratifications of Conventions Nos. 87 and 98 but pointed out that there was still progress to be made in this area given the fact that these were the most fundamental instruments of the ILO. They made an appeal in this regard, inviting the countries experiencing difficulties to request ILO technical assistance and emphasizing that the General Survey would, without a doubt, be a useful instrument to this end. Several of the members recalled that ratification without any true intention to apply the Convention did not correspond to the spirit of international labour standards.

167. The Workers' members expressed their surprise at the reasons given by some governments to justify or explain the non-ratification and noted that these were not well-founded reasons, but rather were pretexts. The principles of freedom of association and collective bargaining were constitutional principles universally applicable; the only difference concerned the supervisory procedures, in particular with respect to the competence of the Committee of Experts and this Committee.

168. The Employers' members remarked that the chapter concerning highlights of the last decade was helpful in giving a picture of the global situation and the problems encountered. They took note of the information given on ratifications and expressed their conviction that prospects in this area would be much better if the Committee of Experts had not made such a broad interpretation of these Conventions, particularly with respect to the right to strike. If these interpretations did not have a mandatory effect, they nevertheless were very dissuasive psychologically.

169. Recalling that his country had recently ratified Convention No. 98, the Government member of the Netherlands noted that some countries which had mentioned the social clause had not ratified Conventions Nos. 87 and 98. This was not a good example for developing countries and even for other countries which had not yet ratified the Conventions.

170. Several Government members, in particular those from Namibia and the United States, stressed that the application of standards was more important than their ratification. The Government member of the United States added that the legislation and practice in her country was largely in conformity with the ILO principles of freedom of association and that the ratification and implementation of Conventions was of increasing importance. The ratification by the United States of Conventions Nos. 144 and 105 was made possible by the tripartite machinery established for assuring that legislation and practice were in conformity with ILO Conventions. Her Government would commit itself to this tripartite process to ensure that the legislation was in line with the obligations of the Convention and would make any necessary changes before ratification. If ratification of Convention No. 87 were envisaged, ILO technical assistance would be requested. The General Survey would also be very helpful in this process.

171. The Government member of the Czech Republic informed the Committee that a similar tripartite process had begun and was a body responsible for, among other things, examining the possibility of ratifying new Conventions. The Government member of Uganda also recalled the very recent ratification by his country of Convention No. 144 which moved in the direction of greater consultation with the social partners.

Final remarks on the survey

172. The Employers' members remarked that, in this brief recapitulation of their principal observations, the Experts seemed to desire a return to traditional values. As regards the concern of the Experts with respect to the phenomena of privatization and to some recent tendencies in the market economy, the Employers' members expressed their belief that workers would certainly find advantages therein and that these measures were indispensable to the survival of many enterprises. Among these measures were, first, the strengthening of competitiveness by the creation of smaller units of production which could more easily and more rapidly adapt. The Employers' members supported this type of positive and necessary evolution. They indicated their belief that the values and fundamental objectives of Conventions Nos. 87 and 98 would still play a role, even in a changing world. One could not, on the one hand, watch the rapidly changing world and believe that the ILO would not be affected: it had to be possible, as was rightly said by the Director-General in his Report, to defend values and promote change. The great principles and laws took their force from laying out essential values and leaving the details aside. From this distance, one could affirm that the ILO, in the years 1948-49, had wisely decided to limit itself to setting forth fundamental principles of freedom of association and collective bargaining in Conventions Nos. 87 and 98. The details added by the Committee of Experts should be gradually withdrawn.

173. The Workers' members stated that the Experts had very rightly placed their final considerations within the context of the extensive structural changes at the socio-economic level and in society in general. Even if the impact of this evolution varied greatly from one country to another, it was remarkable that similar problems were resolved in a radically different manner when the financial constraints were the same and that ILO standards and objectives were respected in some countries and not in others, or only partially. This gap was largely due to the priorities and differing political choices.

174. The Workers' members recalled that respect for the principles of freedom of association and free collective bargaining should not be subordinated to the political and economic situation or to the level of development. Standards did not imply direct labour costs but offered governments, workers and employers and their respective organizations, the possibility of progressively developing their system while taking into account the social and economic context. It was from this perspective that one should look at the call by the Experts for a world social platform of which freedom of association and free collective bargaining were an essential component (paragraph 330). These standards set forth the essential rules for the functioning and development of the actors in the employment market and for a continual development of social and economic policy. This was why the constitutional principles of freedom of association and free collective bargaining were considered as fundamental labour standards. This classification was approved by the Governing Body in 1987. Conventions Nos. 87 and 98 were classified by the Governing Body in 1993 among the ten priority Conventions for which reports were due every two years.

175. The Workers' members recalled that since 1951, the ILO has established a specific tripartite committee, the Committee on Freedom of Association, which examines in a flexible manner complaints concerning the violation of the constitutional principles of freedom of association and free collective bargaining. It was important to recall that this Committee submitted its unanimous conclusions to the Governing Body. That was proof in itself that tripartism played an effective role in the search for solutions and the resolution of disputes.

176. The Workers' members pointed out that true tripartism, which presumes a total respect for freedom of association and free collective bargaining, was undergoing heavy attack in a number of countries because of structural problems, cyclical problems, or both. Some even attribute high unemployment to social dialogue. Tripartism and free collective bargaining however were in the long run an economically efficient method. Dialogue between the workers' and employers' organizations on the one hand and with the public authorities in a tripartite fashion on the other, guaranteed the democratic nature of society as well as the necessary social infrastructure to carry out a viable social and economic policy. This was also the position of the Experts, particularly in paragraphs 334 and 336.

177. The Workers' members stressed that the Experts had also drawn attention to the very real danger of the weakening, desired or not, of freedom of association and free collective bargaining (paragraphs 335-337) account being given to the intensification of competition and the diverse measures taken by enterprises, countries and regions in order to strengthen their position in the global economy, . This danger can only be avoided if specific measures are taken to preserve fundamental rights. The Workers' members made a few suggestions in this regard, such as: (i) when enterprises are split or fragmented, the existing individual and collective rights, such as the action of trade union representation and the validity of collective agreements must be maintained (the ILO does not yet have a specific instrument in this regard); (ii) in order to safeguard collective rights in small and medium enterprises, a system of collective bargaining could be set up beyond the framework of the enterprise to the level of joint sectoral negotiation committees. Recognition of trade unions could also be based on systems surpassing the framework of the enterprise by the recognition of federations and confederations by sector. Within the system of recognition of trade unions by enterprise, the public authorities should use all means to encourage the employers, including the small and medium enterprises, to recognize trade unions and to negotiate effectively. In paragraph 257, the Experts rightly emphasized the crucial importance of the conclusion of a first collective agreement; (iii) subcontracting networks should respect fundamental labour standards by the insertion of specific clauses in trade agreements and through collaboration; (iv) in the case of employment through temporary work agencies or private employment services, a theme being discussed this year in a tripartite Conference committee, the use of temporary workers to replace striking workers must be explicitly prohibited (see also paragraph 175 of the survey). Furthermore, the trade union rights of temporary workers must also be safeguarded.

178. The Workers' members also called upon governments and employers to respect or ensure respect for the principles of freedom of association and free collective bargaining and associated themselves with the Experts' call in favour of the ratification of Conventions Nos. 87 and 98, a demonstration of support for the principles embodied in the Constitution. This call was important in the light of the 75th anniversary of the ILO, the Copenhagen Social Summit in 1995 and increasing globalization.

179. In the final part of their intervention, the Employers' members remarked that during the time of East-West conflict, two members of the Committee of Experts systematically expressed their dissension on certain points, in particular those linked to the freedom of association Conventions, while the majority of the Committee contradicted this view and emphasized their unanimity on all points. Fortunately, these times were now gone by and there was no longer a situation which might be described as an emergency situation, making it necessary to demonstrate unity where there really were differences on the substance. Everybody would fully understand that this situation affected all members of the Committee in equal measure. It was a question of survival for this Organization and particularly of the supervisory system, that everybody should stand shoulder to shoulder on these fundamental questions. Anyone who failed to take account of that fact was either enviably young or had a very short memory, and anybody who wanted to exploit this fact to demonstrate that there had been a change of opinion on the Employers' side, would have to justify this before the court of his own conscience. The Employers' members' opinion had certainly not changed since the last General Survey on the subject was published in 1983. Furthermore, the problems discussed in those days touched upon substantial questions such as forced labour, trade union monopoly, dependancy of trade unions from the Communist Party and had nothing to do with the somewhat artificial questions of the limits of the right to strike. Could one really expect that the situation of the 20 Experts in the Committee of Experts would be any different from other legal bodies like the supreme courts of States, where it was normal to have legal dissenting votes, which were normally published? There were many differing opinions on the right to strike. Could one really expect the 20 Experts to be totally of one mind on every detail? While the official rules of the Committee left room for dissenting opinion by members, which may be published at their request, the Employers' members would like to know what was the real general opinion in the Committee of Experts. As the next General Survey on freedom of association was still some time ahead, the Employers would welcome if in the meantime the Committee's reports in coming years would reflect new considerations on the number of controversial areas which might be taken up in somewhat different terms. They believed that this approach would do much to enhance the credibility and the effectiveness of the supervisory system.

Conclusions

180. The Committee concluded its work on the General Survey by noting that the debate, particularly rich and fruitful, gave everyone the possibility to express themselves on complex problems of freedom of association and collective bargaining, taking into account the global context. A wide consensus arose from the discussions on the General Survey. The Employers' members nevertheless expressed their disagreement on the question of whether the freedom of association Conventions included extensive and detailed regulation of the ability of governments to limit the right to strike. The Committee expressed the hope that the Committee of Experts' General Survey and the discussion in the Conference Committee would contribute to the recognition and promotion of the principles of freedom of association embodied in the ILO Constitution. It made a solemn call for the ratification of fundamental Conventions, the principles of which were at the core of the ILO mandate, and the respect of which was an indispensable prerequisite for the defence of workers' and employers' interests throughout the word, particularly in an international context characterized by very rapid changes and accelerated globalization of the economy.

D. The future of the ILO's standard setting

181. As stated above, the Committee decided to devote a special day during its general discussion to a debate on the theme of the future of ILO standards. The Committee of Experts in particular contributed its thoughts, and the Director-General of the ILO examined prospects for the Organization's standard-setting activities in a chapter of his Report to the Conference, while there were several statements in the Conference Plenary and the Resolutions Committee on the subject. The Conference's Committee on the Application of Standards is nevertheless specially well equipped to conduct a structured dialogue on the future of standard setting, since it is by its nature and activities more closely familiar with the potential and the limits of the standard-setting and supervisory system, as the Workers' members noted.

182. This was confirmed by the number of speakers (almost 50) from the three groups in the Committee, the scope and richness of the discussions, and the interesting technical or more fundamental proposals or suggestions made.

183. Following the discussion, the Committee expressed the hope that all views voiced in the general discussion, and in particular the special sitting on the future of standards, would be documented for the Governing Body and its Committee on Legal Issues and International Labour Standards for future reference. It requested the Director-General to do everything necessary to ensure this.

Statement of the Workers' members

184. The Workers' members already dealt directly or indirectly with certain aspects of the future of standards and their supervision during the general discussion on the report of the Committee of Experts and the General Survey (section B, above). They now developed more substantially two themes: the elaboration of standards and supervision of their application.

Elaboration and contents of standards

185. The Workers' members pointed to the international context of structural changes on the socio-economic plane and in society as a whole, the imperative of competitivity, and increasing globalization of the economy. The ILO and its basic principles were increasingly required to play the role of a lifeline in the face of unbridled competition, social exclusion and poverty. This involved not only a moral and legal obligation but also an economic necessity. The fall of the Berlin Wall which took place in 1989 clearly had significant consequences for the democratization process in many countries. But it was not sufficient to instal a formal policy of democracy: this new trend should also translate to the level of the organization of economic and social life.

186. The Workers' members were entirely in agreement with the position of the Committee of Experts, that standards on fundamental human rights must be observed regardless of economic circumstances or fluctuations. They noted with satisfaction that the Director-General shared this point of view in his Report to the Conference.

187. Fundamental standards offer countries, workers and employers and their respective organizations the possibility of progressively developing their social system while taking into account the economic context. All countries, independently of their social or economic situation or their political system, should respect the Conventions and the principles concerning freedom of association, free collective bargaining and the prohibition of forced labour, child labour and discrimination in employment within the broad and contemporary accepted meaning of the term.

188. It was in this sense and from this perspective that the call of the experts in their General Survey for a world social platform and the proposal of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU), the World Confederation of Labour (WCL) and the European Trade Union Confederation (ECTU) for a social clause must be viewed. Respect for this world social platform and the social clause would permit a better distribution, within and among countries, of the fruits of economic development and growth. They would in the end stimulate international trade so that distribution of purchasing power among the population would be guaranteed. The social clause advocated by the Workers' members had nothing to do with protectionism. The logic of such a clause is contained in the Preamble to the ILO Constitution: "the failure of any nation to adopt humane conditions of labour is an obstacle in the way of other nations which desire to improve the conditions in their own countries".

189. The Workers' members hoped that the ILO would very actively pursue discussion on the social clause. In doing so, the ILO would favour the adoption of provisions discouraging unfair labour practices and would also open the way for a reduction of protectionist pressures. To appease fears of disguised protectionism, the Workers' members wanted the ILO to give priority in its contacts with the World Trade Organization (WTO) and other organizations to the implementation of a mechanism which would accentuate the need to look for solutions to disputes by mutual agreement. There could be no recourse to trade sanctions except in cases where an agreement or another positive solution was not possible.

190. The Workers' members were of the view that national and multinational enterprises and networks of enterprises must be made responsible. Often enterprises hid behind governments to justify the violation of international standards. The Report of the Director-General contained interesting suggestions in this regard and the Committee of Experts also referred in its General Survey (paragraph 60) to the Tripartite Declaration of Principles concerning Multinational Enterprises and Social Policy with respect to free trade zones.

191. The position of the Workers' members could be summarized as follows:

(i) All countries should ratify as a priority the ten Conventions that the Governing Body in November 1993 retained for the sending of reports every two years: Conventions concerning human rights (Nos. 29, 87, 98, 100, 105, 111) and others equally considered priority Conventions No. 122 on employment policy, Nos. 81 and 129 on labour inspection and No. 144 on tripartite consultation. Pending ratification, countries concerned, enterprises (national or multinational), and employers' and workers' organizations should already apply the principles contained in those instruments. Moreover, tripartism, freedom of association and free collective bargaining are constitutional principles which apply to all member States. In the event of technical or administrative difficulties, technical assistance and multidisciplinary teams are available to assist and cooperate with governments as well as with employers' and workers' organizations:

(ii) Ratifications and respect for the principles contained in Conventions and Recommendations may not be limited to the ten Conventions set out above. Others such as those on occupational safety and health, the fixing of minimum wages, minimum age, seafarers, indigenous peoples and tribes and social security establish important social policy principles while leaving a margin for manoeuvre in translating them at the national level. As stated by the Committee of Experts in paragraph 20 of their report, a large number of flexibility clauses are included in existing Conventions. And yet, some such Conventions, like Convention No. 102 concerning minimal social security standards, are not ratified by many member States. The Workers' members are not opposed to the revision of standards in cases where it can be clearly proved that they are not adapted to present circumstances, or where there is a consensus that a specific point causes serious problems of ratification for a large number of countries. Revision activities and updated standards could in particular be based on general surveys. This year's discussion of the General Survey on Freedom of Association and Collective Bargaining confirmed the contemporary values of the principles of Conventions Nos. 87 and 98. The Workers and the vast majority of the Committee also supported the position of the Committee of Experts with regard to the right to strike and agree that revision or supplementary standards are not desirable.

(iii) Revision should not be used to weaken or eliminate protection of workers. In order to commence a revision of a Convention or part of a Convention, there must be an atmosphere of confidence among the groups. Undiscriminating calls for revision are mostly based on a pure and simple rejection of standards as such rather than detailed analysis.

(iv) The Workers' members emphasized categorically that the ILO must continue to elaborate standards. The Committee of Experts was also of opinion in paragraph 18 of its report that the ILO has not exhausted its function of adopting standards. Social and economic developments were dynamic in the globalization of the economy, the fragmentation of enterprises, rapid expansion of commercial and non-commercial services, new technologies, etc. Labour standards must follow these developments. For example, during the discussion of the General Survey, the Workers' members mentioned that the ILO does not yet have a Convention on labour tribunals and the maintenance of individual and collective bargaining rights in the event of the transfer of an enterprise, although these were two important aspects of social legislation in many member States.

Supervision of the application of standards

192. With regard to supervision of the application of standards, the present system was able to provide tangible results, despite the absence of compelling sanctions. This success was in particular due to the fundamental characteristics of the ILO, that is to say the contribution of employers' and workers' organizations, dialogue and persuasion. The strong points of the system must not be abandoned. Improvements should have as a major objective the reinforcement of dialogue and effective cooperation with the supervisory bodies. There had been radical changes in the international context and it was important that the ILO intervene rapidly, effectively and with authority in order to assert international standards and principles. The Workers' members are of the view that, given these developments, the supervisory procedures should be reinforced.

193. The Workers' members made six specific proposals:

(i) there should be an efficient and dynamic mechanism, similar to the Committee on Freedom of Association, to facilitate better application of principles concerning forced labour and child labour and deal with cases of discrimination. It was essential that workers' organizations be able to introduce complaints without the consent of their governments, and that the mechanism be available even if the country concerned has not ratified the relevant Convention;

(ii) the introduction of rapid mechanisms such as voluntary mediation and arbitration. Direct contacts missions already exist and are often suggested by the Conference Committee and the Committee of Experts to remedy problems regarding the failure to apply standards. Those procedures should not be used to escape supervisory bodies such as the Conference Committee. The coherence and integrity of the supervisory system should be guaranteed;

(iii) taking account in the application of the social clause of non-fulfilment of obligations to respond to supervisory bodies, lack of respect for conclusions of the Conference Committee on Standards, and failure to cooperate in anything to do with the application of the ILO's fundamental Conventions and principles. The social clause should not be an alternative to dialogue and persuasion but it should serve to strengthen them;

(iv) compensation and measures to rectify damage incurred by workers and their organizations through failure to apply Conventions or constitutional principles. They also referred to their position during the discussion of the General Survey. They asked the governments and the Employers to consider this proposal seriously;

(v) strengthening employers' and workers' organizations, the basis of the effectiveness of the supervisory procedures. The Office and the member States should actively assist them. Strong and efficient social partners are also essential for the success of the active partnership policy advocated in the report of the Director-General. Workers' organizations are essential for the defence and the development of individual rights in a coherent framework;

(vi) the Workers' members referred to the points of view that they expressed in the first part of the general discussion concerning the relationship between the Conference Committee on Standards and the Committee of Experts, the new system for sending reports and the absolute necessity that there be sufficient financial means for the ILO to fulfil its mandate.

194. In conclusion, the Workers' members asked for a campaign for a World Charter or world social platform which would have until the year 2000 as its primary objective the universal ratification of fundamental Conventions by all member States. This campaign should also strengthen tripartism at all levels, in order to create a true partnership.

Statement of the Employers' members

195. The Employers' members noted that the Committee of Experts and the Conference Committee were both well placed to identify problems of standard setting and implementation. Problems of discrepancies between standards and national provisions and practice arose when the ILO's standards did not take enough account of national situations, and Conference technical committees should be given the necessary feedback in this respect. What was needed was an evaluation of effects and legal consequences, a kind of technological impact study so that before any standard was adopted the right conclusions could be drawn. The ILO's objectives remained as clear as ever, but the means for their attainment were in urgent need of review. In their view for some time there had been clear signals within the ILO that the framework for standards was no longer in good condition, and that there must be some in-depth thinking about what to do in the future, as was clearly reflected in paragraphs 10-23 of the report of the Committee of Experts and in Chapter 3 of the Report of the Director-General.

196. In their statement, the Employers' members considered the role of standards as one of the ILO's means of action, and made various proposals to improve the procedures for elaborating and following up standards and supervising their application.

A. Standards as a means of ILO action

197. The Employer's members recognize the importance of the ILO's standard-setting activity — that of the adoption of Conventions and Recommendations by the International Labour Conference. The procedures for drawing up these standards — which enable all member States to participate on a tripartite basis and on an equal footing — as well as the impartiality of the supervisory mechanisms give this activity its special value. It remains one of the means of promoting, at the world level, fair social progress based on consensus between the social forces and the free commitment of States at all levels of development. Stressing the fact that it is not necessarily the best means by which to achieve the Organization's objectives does not mean putting the validity of this activity to question. Fortunately, the ILO possesses other means of action. All standards contained in Conventions do not have the same value; they are often old and obsolete and must be constantly updated to take into account changes in the world and difficulties encountered. The ILO's system of standard setting is in fact coming up against increasing criticism, and this not only from the employer benches. Standards are registering fewer and fewer ratifications, and their credibility is losing ground. In order to maintain what is most fundamental, a thorough reform should be envisaged so that ILO standards regain their importance.

198. It is true that the authors of the ILO Constitution referred, in 1919, almost solely to standards — in the form of Conventions and Recommendations — as the means available to the Organization to achieve the objectives set out in its Preamble. Some reference, however, is made in the Constitution to assistance to governments in the framing of laws and regulations and in the improvement of administrative practices (article 10.2). Standards have traditionally been considered as the "heart", or the core of the ILO's activities. Does this privileged role still correspond to the objectives fixed by the ILO today?

199. One of the most eminent ILO officials in the standards field, Nicolas Valticos, wrote that standards and technical cooperation are means which are "aimed to guide and to stimulate governmental action". In the same volume, he considers cooperation as "a means of helping governments reach the level of standards laid down in international labour Conventions". He also mentions standards as serving as a guide to technical cooperation experts.

200. While this notion recognizes that technical cooperation has a significant place, the role accorded to it is only secondary — that of a means of promoting standards. Generally speaking, isn't this approach too authoritative, too paternalist? Doesn't it boil down to telling States what they should be doing; rather than helping them achieve the social goals they have fixed for themselves?

201. This being so, is there not a place, in most fields of ILO activity, for a separate technical cooperation function or other non-standard-setting activities? For example, the promotion of productive employment calls for support in training and in the creation of enterprises — themes which are not really suitable for coverage by binding universal standards. The same goes for human resources management. Both these areas of ILO activity concur with a very considerable demand on the part of constituents and contribute immensely to the possibilities for social progress.

202. The fact that the fundamental human rights instruments — such as those on freedom of association or forced labour, which have received a large number of ratifications — are upheld as sacred texts can well be understood. But should other Conventions which have received only a few ratifications, or which were adopted under conditions where no consensus whatsoever prevailed, be put into the same basket? The fact that member States have a constitutional right to choose not to ratify a Convention should also be recognized. This right is one of the essential features of the terms set out by the ILO Constitution, and must be borne in mind in any initiative aimed at improving the world's social condition, since its effectiveness ultimately depends on the positive attitude of member States. In this connection, providing technical cooperation cannot be used as a means of putting pressure on a government to ratify or implement a standard which, in the country in question, is considered unfitting.

203. Standards are an important means, but only one means among others of achieving the ILO's objectives. Their right role should therefore be examined.

204. In most countries, the trend is towards less regulation in order to leave more room for individual initiative and for negotiation. It is increasingly acknowledged that national standards must concentrate on what is essential and not get bogged down in unnecessary detail. This is just as true for international regulations. The more the latter try to cover everything in minute detail, the less applicable and credible they become. Refocusing international standards on the fundamental points is therefore the best way of strengthening their effectiveness.

205. What fields are, or still could be, covered by ILO standards?

206. Items recently proposed to the Governing Body lead one to think that the reservoir of questions of universal interest is running dry. This is particularly the case for the principal texts on human rights, the essential aspects of labour law, safety and health, and social security. What remains are subjects of a more technical nature, for which the cumbersome Conference procedure would seem out of all proportion. One sometimes gets the impression that it is not a question of deciding which items are appropriate topics for an instrument, but of how to find subjects in order to make up an agenda which must contain a predetermined number of standard-setting items.

207. In certain areas, it is impossible to impose precise obligations on States; all that can be done is give guidance — for example, as regards employment or training. These are then referred to as "promotional" Conventions. This formula, which makes for greater flexibility, is clearly useful; but are they really Conventions, especially when it comes to supervising their application? Should there not be provision for more suitable procedures?

208. Do all subjects lend themselves to the elaboration of Conventions? A universal standard is only conceivable if there is a minimum of uniformity in member States. There has never been thought, for example, of establishing a minimum international wage, except for maritime transport (and, even then, its significance may be questioned). The same would no doubt be true for the duration of working time; attempts in this direction have not been at all convincing.

209. ILO Conventions are only binding if ratified — which means that States are only bound by their contents if they accept, in total liberty, the legal obligations they contain. It is sometimes claimed that a ratified Convention has a certain value, as a goal to be reached — a sort of "target". It is dangerous to believe this, since it would be diminishing the importance and credibility of ILO instruments. However, to be ratified, a Convention must be ratifiable — that is, drafted in such a way that it can be implemented in countries differing not only in their degree of development but also in their legal concepts and their cultures.

210. Apart from a few fundamental instruments, ILO Conventions on the whole receive little ratification. This is not a new problem, but the situation is increasingly deteriorating. While this is partly explained by the complications arising from the European unification, it is mainly due to the inapplicability of texts adopted. The reason may be the lack of countries' development, but also the exaggeratedly complex and detailed nature of their provisions, which makes ratification difficult, even for the so-called "advanced" nations. These difficulties should be taken into consideration both when items are being chosen and defined, and during their discussion at the Conference. It is striking that, among the less-ratified Conventions are those concerning occupational safety and health — an area which all agree is the ILO's responsibility and in which instruments are generally adopted by a very large majority.

211. For Conventions already adopted, the only solution is revision in the fight of difficulties actually encountered, which would lead to greater flexibility (and not the contrary). The Governing Body should set up a coherent plan for the revision of instruments which have received little ratification.

212. As regards the future, the Governing Body and the ILO's general management should examine all means of action available in order to ensure that the objectives set by the Organization are carried out, even if they are not part of its traditional array of activities. The General Conference may have a certain effect on public opinion. Other avenues than constitutional instruments (which are too rigid) or general discussions (which receive little attention) could be pursued.

In certain circumstances more discrete means such as personal contacts and talks — may be more appropriate.

213. Finally, those with responsibility in the ILO — delegates and officials — must not lose sight of the fact that, today, regulation is no longer the sacrosanct way of ensuring social protection. Excessive regulation is increasingly seen as being a brake on economic development and, as a consequence, on social progress. It would be better to ensure that those concerned have maximum room for initiative and responsibility. Regulation, therefore, is only justified when it is essential. This also goes for international regulation.

214. With this in mind, a certain number of objective and recognized criteria must be defined to guide the Governing Body in its choice. The main questions to be asked would be:

- Is drawing up a new standard essential in order to achieve a recognized ILO objective — such as the struggle to create productive employment, the strengthening of the parties to tripartism, the reduction of major industrial hazards?
- Does the topic in question affect a large number of workers in most parts of the world?
- Is there sufficient consensus among the parties concerned to achieve significant results?

215. The "Ventejol" working parties that were set up by the Governing Body in 1979 and 1987 were unable to reach a consensus on the criteria to govern the standards policy no doubt because the basic problem of the relevancy of standards was not clearly put.

216. When the ILO was founded, certain protagonists saw its role not as that of simply progressively harmonizing social protection, but as a means of getting rid of the existence of inferior working conditions, as being legitimately instrumental to the competitivity between enterprises and between nations. This objective was not maintained, since the Conventions adopted by the Conference have no immediate compelling effect, they are only legally binding for those States which have ratified them. This is an important ILO constitutional principle which it would be practically impossible to change, and which prevents the ILO from being party, for example, to the inclusion of a "social clause" in trade agreements.

217. In conclusion:

- standards are a means of achieving the ILO's objectives;
- since the standards procedure is burdensome, and in view of the difficulties encountered with ratification and application, the ILO should only embark upon the elaboration of new standards when absolutely necessary, and this in accordance with criteria which correspond to the objectives of the Organization;
- the present rhythm of adopting new standards should be slowed down, and greater priority given to the systematic revision of texts already adopted, in order to facilitate their wider ratification and application by most member States;

— new standards should be drafted in such a way that they can be ratified and applied by all member States;

— member States should not be subject to obligations or sanctions which go beyond the Constitution and those instruments they have freely ratified.

B. Improving the standards-related procedures

218. The problems associated with standard setting are such that a global approach is calledfor along the lines described above. However, it is also just as necessary to review the procedures governing their elaboration and follow-up. Some of them date back to the first years of the Organization, when there were few member States and they were all similar. Rather than take a fragmented look at the problem, a comprehensive study should be carried out, allowing for a global reform. It is in this spirit that the employers put forward the following proposals; eight proposals for improving the standards procedure:

(1) Improving the procedure for fixing the Conference agenda: at present, the Governing Body makes its choice on the basis of a very limited "menu". Possibilities for expanding this choice are limited, and the Governing Body proceeds more by elimination. The Governing Body is not able to have a long-term view, which is essential if a true standards policy is to be adopted. For this, it is proposed to broaden the possibilities of choice in order to have a discussion on the general orientation of the standards policy, the criteria to be followed, a systematic plan for updating old instruments, possible new subjects for which standards would be necessary, and items for general discussion. The Governing Body's first discussion on the Conference agenda could be used for this purpose.

(2) Improving the preparation of questionnaires: since government officials like to answer "yes" to the questions asked, the way these are drafted strongly influences the final text. The need for instruments drawn up to be limited to the essential and to include sufficient flexibility clauses must be taken into consideration. For this, the authors should carry out unofficial consultations in order to identify where views diverge. Items to be included in the questionnaire could also be debated in the Governing Body. Governments should also indicate, in their replies, how they intend implementing the proposals they approve.

(3) Seeking consensus within the Committees: the Chairmen and the secretariats of Committees should seek to solve the major difficulties by consensus rather then resorting to voting, the results of which are often fortuitous. This would go a long way to avoiding difficulties in ratification.

(4) Increasing the importance of Recommendations as separate instruments: Conventions and Recommendations do not necessarily have to go together to have any value: each of these instruments has its own merits, and their application, either jointly or separately, must be evaluated in each case.

(5) Controlling the role of regional groups: the influence of groups of integrating States is negative when they try to impose the contents of their own instruments on ILO Conventions and Recommendations. This is particularly a problem today with regard to the European Union, but may concern other regions in the future. It may put the universality of ILO standards at danger, since texts over which a certain region of the world have had too great an influence risk being inapplicable in other regions and, as a consequence, not ratifiable.

(6) Toughening the conditions governing the coming into force of Conventions: under present practice, a Convention comes into force when it has received two ratifications. As a consequence, certain Conventions are in force but have been ratified by only a very few member States and this creates an unnecessary burden for the supervisory mechanism. The number should be increased — a modification which would not require any amendment of the Constitution or Standing Orders as regards future Conventions, since the number is fixed in the final clauses of each instrument. The problem of Conventions which have already been adopted is more difficult to solve, but these difficulties are not impossible to overcome.

(7) Adopting a coherent plan for the revision of standards: the replies which, under article 19 of the Constitution, governments submit to questionnaires on non-ratified Conventions, together with the Experts' report thereupon, should be systematically used in preparing a plan for the revision of standards, which should take difficulties encountered, as well as the ILO's objectives, into consideration.

(8) Revising the denunciation periods: denunciation of a Convention is a difficult process, since it is only possible during a very limited period of time and at intervals which are too widely spaced. This discourages ratification by making Conventions almost irreversible. A reform should first of all be applied to new Conventions, as the legal problems involved would be less complex. Periods for denunciation could be fixed according to the importance of Conventions and their character.

C. Strengthening the supervisory procedures

219. A strict control over the application of standards should be maintained, since it guarantees their credibility and assures a responsible attitude on the part of authorities which adopt or ratify ILO instruments. Certain improvements should nevertheless be studied in order to strengthen the efficiency of supervisory procedures on ILO member States.

220. A first path to be followed in such reform is to improve the working methods of the supervisory bodies so that they are more selective and more effective. While the reforms proposed to the Governing Body follow this line (calendar, intervals of examination) and should be supported, other possibilities for reform still exist.

221. Secondly, the supervisory procedure should be better integrated into the ILO's long-term planning. While its prime aim is to ensure that member States respect their obligations, other means should be sought, without prejudice to the former: contributing to the implementation of the Organization's objectives. For example, as regards the combat against child labour, a critical examination of the relative instruments is necessary to determine the best means of action: a new instrument, revision, technical cooperation, meetings.

222. Finally, the mandate of the various organs which play a role in the procedure should be clarified. The problem lies mainly with the interpretation of texts. Recourse to the International Court of Justice — the only measure provided for by the Constitution — is, in practice, out of the question. The Committee of Experts, whatever its prestige, is not a jurisdictional body. The setting up of a special tribunal, mentioned as a possibility in the Constitution, is one of the paths that should be explored since its very existence would make the Experts' functions much clearer. The existence of a "jurisprudence" (the word is certainly not correct) which sometimes broadens the obvious meaning of texts, adds useless detail or introduces differentiations which unnecessarily complicate their firm application, adds nothing to the credibility of the procedure and slows down ratification. In any case, member States wishing to ratify should be informed of the "interpretation" given to texts by the supervisory bodies.

223. The role of the Committee on Freedom of Association — which is not a supervisory body in the strict sense of the term — as well as of its decisions, must be clarified in this connection, notably in relation to that of the Committee of Experts.

224. There is no question of weakening the supervisory mechanisms, or of jeopardizing their independence, but of strengthening them so that greater use may be made of them to achieve the objectives of the Organization.

Other statements in the discussion

225. After the opening statements by the speakers for the two groups, supported and supplemented by several other members of the groups, especially the Workers, some 20 Government members also spoke during the special day. All these statements are included in the formal minutes of that sitting, which thus form a record. The present report is as complete as possible but aims to avoid repeating the ideas expressed and the suggestions made by the speakers for the two groups during the general discussion (see section B, above).

226. Once again, the discussions showed the devotion to the principle of universality of standards and the necessary flexibility which goes with it when they are elaborated. The Government member of France recalled that ILO membership had grown from 42 at its creation to 171 today, which made it essential to consider the meaning of universality of standards. Should standards be demanding and precise in order to be a sort of ideal reference or should they remain general in order to be ratified by a greater number? Of course, both approaches were needed, and flexibility clauses in Conventions themselves should not be too necessary. In November 1989, the Governing Body adopted a document on this subject which had been unjustly neglected, although it could help to increase numbers of ratifications. Other Government members, for example, India, United Kingdom and United States also favoured flexibility and terms which enable it, even if as the Government member of Germany observed, the notion of flexibility should not be held out as an answer to all problems.

227. Flexibility of standards should, in the view of the Government member of Saudi Arabia, enable them to be adapted to conditions in various countries and their variable ability to comply with standards, although that did not mean less attachment to the principle of universality and indivisibility of standards. ILO standards place numerous obligations on member States, most of which are developing countries and have difficulty in meeting requirements designed to address the needs of developed and industrialized countries. Many Conventions should be re-examined and revised and other standards adopted, and the need to revise standards should be taken into account in the elaboration and adoption procedure in the ILO, adapting them to developments in the world and realistic possibilities for countries through preliminary tripartite discussions in order to make standards practicable. Flexibility resulting from a ratification procedure which is either partial or complete would enable countries whose legislation is not at first fully compatible with the Convention to ratify it and apply it progressively.

228. The Workers' member of Poland noted that article 19, paragraph 3, of the Constitution, envisages taking account of the level of industrial development of countries and other particular circumstances, although flexibility should not be allowed as regards standards on basic human rights. The Committee of Experts had quite rightly said that human rights must be observed whatever the level of economic development. The ILO had at its disposal various flexibility devices which could be combined in a Convention such as the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111), which contains both promotional and prescriptive provisions.

229. The principle of universality implies also effective participation by a greater number in the process of elaboration of standards in order to reach as wide a consensus as possible, as the Government members of Cuba and Japan particularly stressed.

230. In its report, the Committee of Experts examined the question whether the ILO has exhausted its legislative function and should suspend it or even abandon it (paragraph 18 of the report). The Government member of France and most Government members took a midway position on the question of the rate of adoption of standards, in order to avoid being either too precipitate or to bring standard setting to a halt. The Government member of United Kingdom thought the rate should be slowed down; the Government member of Belgium thought that in the long term it would be destabilizing to consider a pause in this procedure necessary and it would perhaps be better to ensure that subjects proposed for standards are more widely supported by each of the groups and each region of the world, following early consultations, regional conferences, and conclusions of international symposiums, and by close analysis of overlapping and grey areas in the protection of workers' basic rights. The fundamental importance of the choice of subjects for the Conference agenda was also raised by several other Government members, such as those of Australia, France, Germany, India and Mexico.

231. The Workers' member of the Netherlands was concerned by the attitude of Employers' and Government members who maintain that there are enough standards and that in the context of economic globalization no new standards were necessary. The representative of the World Federation of Trade Unions (WFTU) considered the worsening of economic and social inequality evidenced by the report of the Committee of Experts shows precisely that standard setting activity should not be suspended, in order not to deprive the ILO of one of the most effective means of maintaining momentum for progress and social dialogue, and the fact that no instrument had been included on the agenda of the Conference for 1996 could be a dangerous precedent.

232. Most Government members who spoke on the subject agreed on the need to give priority to the revision of Conventions which have not been widely ratified or are old-fashioned or outmoded, especially those of France, Japan, Mexico, Norway (speaking on behalf of the Nordic countries) and United Kingdom. They suggested ways of doing this: for example, the Government member of France thought it could be useful to update the work of the Governing body working party known as the "Ventejol report". The Government member of Cuba also wished to see such work renewed, while others such as the Government member of United Kingdom wished for better use to be made of the Committee of Experts' General Surveys under article 19 of the Constitution.

233. The representative of the World Federation of Trade Unions (WFTU) could not understand why standards which are relevant and newly adopted should be revised on the ground that they have not yet been sufficiently been ratified, since even an unratified Convention was of value, if relevant, as a source of inspiration or guidance for the future of countries. In his view the aim of the ILO should still be the positive development of national legislation, and international labour standards are generally flexible or correspond to absolute minima if what was intended was really to promote social justice and basic human rights.

234. In paragraph 22 of its report, the Committee of Experts considered the criticisms from some quarters alleging lack of clarity and consistency in the provisions of some Conventions adopted recently, and suggested that members of technical standard committees of the Conference should see that drafts finally approved were as coherent and lucid as possible. Several Government members (France, Morocco, Norway (speaking for the Nordic countries), United Kingdom and United States) agreed with the Committee of Experts in this respect. The Government member of Germany viewed the increasingly complex and detailed nature of Conventions as raising obstacles to ratification. The Government member of France wondered whether the secretariat were perhaps too ambitious in making proposals, whilst such perfectionism is not acceptable to many Governments as well as by agreements between Employers' and Workers' groups. Systematically placing an official of the Standards Department in the secretariat of the technical committees should enable delegates to be reminded of the need for legal clarity and draw their attention to the possibility of using flexibility clauses. The Workers' member of Japan noted the growing tendency for technical committees of the Conference in recent years to use the formula "appropriate to national conditions" to modify almost all provisions of an instrument for discussion, whereas such provisions weaken or nullify principles adopted in operative clauses and in most cases are a disguised form of opposition to the draft instrument in whole or in part; they make interpretation and application of Conventions difficult.

235. Several members spoke of the economic impact of standards raised by the Committee of Experts in paragraph 21 of its report, and the Government member of Portugal thought it important to take account of such impact when standards are adopted. The Government member of Cuba disagreed as regards Conventions on social security and saw a contradiction between the restatement of social objectives by the ILO and an apparent tendency to belittle the importance of those Conventions, which should be given high priority in the ILO's activities. The Government member of Belgium found the employment situation in many countries at the root of much of the criticism concerning the development of standards, although it was an insufficient cause for doubting and questioning standards and their fundamental role in favour of social justice. For the Government member of India, future ILO standards must balance labour protection and workers' rights against the need to promote full, productive employment and be dynamic and designed to address the real needs of the constituents in the constantly changing world of labour. Similarly, the Employers' member of the United States described the changes in the economic "rules of the game" that differ substantially from when most ILO standards were adopted. Change was constant and faster than ever, because of scientific and technical progress. Economic nationalities are increasingly blurred, differences of roles and functions in the labour market diminish, employment security cannot in his view be guaranteed by international labour standards but depends on continuing training throughout working life. These were the economic realities which for employers determined their approach to the elaboration and rationalization of standards and supervisory procedures. One of the main challenges for the ILO was to ensure a national and international environment in which employment policy balances the need for flexibility needed in the global economy against social guarantees for the acquisition of vocational training and qualifications, including technical cooperation by the ILO, which are essential for employment growth and productivity. The relevance and importance of international labour standards should be redefined in the framework of these economic realities.

236. The Workers' member of Poland warned against the temptation to give in to false arguments as to the economic impact of standards and recalled that in the 1936 Conference, when a draft Convention on annual paid holidays of six days per year was being discussed, the Employers' member of the United Kingdom claimed that such an undertaking by his country would mean committing industrial suicide; however, the economy of that country had very well accommodated legislation on paid holidays, despite not having ratified the Convention.

237. Several members of the Committee referred to the comments of the Committee of Experts and the Director-General on the length of the period of gestation of the formal standard setting process and suggestions as to greater flexibility — a sort of "soft law", to use the Director-General's term. This approach was welcomed by, for example, the Government members of Australia, France, Mexico and Nigeria. The Government member of France wished the standard-setting system to be supplemented by instruments which would more rapidly meet current requirements, and it should be possible to conceive of guidance or declarations resulting from tripartite discussion by the Conference or the Governing Body. Of course, such supplementary action enabling the Organization to speak quickly on new issues could not replace standard-setting activity. Similarly the Government member of Mexico warned against confusion between legal instruments creating obligations and others such as codes of practice.

238. The system for supervising standards, their procedures and their role and prospects were all discussed.

239. The Workers' member of the United States made his statement on the subject of the supervision of the application of standards and how it might be improved, which is undoubtedly an important question for the standard-setting activity of the ILO. He first stressed the need and the importance of greater participation in the preparation of reports, a crucial element in supervision and in more intense cooperation with all the social partners. The Committee of Experts insisted on the need for the Office to offer more assistance to workers' and employers' organizations to enable them to understand the implications of standards, particularly as regards legislation and practice at the national level, and this was all the more significant given the changes made by the Governing Body in the procedures for sending reports. Direct contacts was a very useful and advantageous procedure for improving observance of standards, including by developing countries, and its modest cost recommended it compared with other procedures. Direct contacts could be especially useful in helping developing countries improve observance of Conventions. Moreover, special paragraphs in the report might, as the Workers' group considered, be more widely used than in recent years, when they had been progressively eroded: special paragraphs should not be confined to significant and flagrant problems or to violations of human rights, but should bring out other cases of incompatibility and omissions as regards the requirements of Conventions. The most serious cases should be highlighted by a special paragraph in order to promote the application and observance of standards, and on this there was no difference between employers and workers.

240. Many Government members supported the system and agreed with the Committee of Experts that it is a model and point of reference at the international level. The Government member of Mexico particularly stressed that it would be dangerous to question the validity and the role of the supervisory bodies. The Government member of France noted that the functioning of the system had improved since each body understood better the nature and limits of its role. The Government member of Spain did not disagree with the links between the supervisory bodies, as underlined by the Government member of Mexico in particular, but thought that the procedures making up the supervisory machinery as a whole should remain independent from each other, and handling of one subject by different procedures at different times should be avoided.

241. The Government member of Saudi Arabia spoke in favour of more equitable geographical distribution of the membership of supervisory bodies: the Committee of Experts' members should have special competence for economic and social questions; the present Committee's work was dominated by the concerns of developed countries, but most countries called to explain themselves were developing ones. The Government member of Norway observed that the work of the present Committee had gradually lost its purpose: the aim should not only be to establish whether the legislation of a member State is or is not in conformity with a Convention, but rather to engage in discussion of the principles of serious global problems, and this could be a source of inspiration for revision or better interpretation of Conventions, as well as for legal and political measures.

242. Several Government members, such as those of Australia, Belgium, Cuba and Mexico, considered that the new procedures for requesting reports decided on by the Governing Body in November 1993 should be favourably received, as they would lighten the task of national administrations. The Government member of Spain nevertheless had doubts on this, since in practice the periodicity of requests for reports was not respected, and for this reason he was against provisions enabling the Committee of Experts to request supplementary detailed reports. The Government member of Germany agreed, since the experts could request partial reports on questions of concern rather than a complete report every year or two.

243. Reducing the frequency of article 22 and article 35 reports under the Constitution could in the view of the Government members of the Nordic countries enable the Committee of Experts to devote greater resources to preparing general surveys on unratified Conventions and Recommendations. Several other Government members (for example, Australia, Belgium, Germany and Japan) stressed the usefulness of thematic surveys of this kind, which were a real work of reference. The Government member of Germany invited governments to give greater attention to sending reports under article 19 of the Constitution, and the Government member of Belgium asked the Committee to examine means of mobilizing international public opinion as regards its work.

244. Several Government members referred to the suggestions in paragraph 41 of the report of the Committee of Experts as to a procedure similar to that of the Committee on Freedom of Association in order to deal with problems of discrimination, forced labour and child labour. The Government member of Australia favoured strengthening the protection of workers' rights in these areas, and the Government members of Austria and Belgium were prepared to examine how to institute such procedures. The Government member of India thought this required serious study, as it would be costly and he was not certain whether such procedures could deal with such problems, which are often linked to poverty more than legislation. The Government members of Germany and the United Kingdom thought it would be irresponsible to create procedures on the basis of that for freedom of association in order to apply other rights. Referring to paragraph 34 of the Committee of Experts' report, indicating that the special procedure for equality of treatment instituted in 1973 had never been used, the Government member of the United Kingdom thought the reasons should be studied. The Workers' member of Japan considered it a potentially very important procedure, given the delicacy of these questions both in the ILO and in the United Nations, and proposed that measures should be taken. The Employers' member of Turkey thought there should be a special discrimination procedure, including in respect of migrant workers, similar to that for freedom of association.

245. The Workers' members of Italy and Poland and the representative of the World Federation of Trade Unions (WFTU) supported the proposals for new procedures to deal with cases of discrimination, forced labour and child labour. As the Workers' member of Poland had said, these procedures should be available against any State whether or not it had ratified a given Convention, since these were matters of fundamental human rights, and the supervisory bodies were bound to derive their legal authority from the ILO Constitution.

246. The Government member of India could not contemplate the ideas discussed as to making access to the supervisory bodies available to individuals, since the credibility of the supervisory system depended on its tripartite nature. The Government member of the United Kingdom considered that such a system would destroy established procedures and be unfortunate at a time when efforts were being made to reduce the workload of the Office. The Workers' members of Japan and Norway also did not favour opening supervisory procedures to individuals, which would damage the basic principle of tripartism and the role of unions in the operation of the system.

247. The Government member of the United Kingdom regarded the idea of voluntary mediation and arbitration mechanisms as attractive and worth examining further since, as the Director-General had indicated, it could be operated at low cost while relieving the rest of the supervisory system and reducing the numbers of complaints, commissions of inquiry and direct contacts missions. Other Government members (Austria, Belgium, Norway) also supported this idea and were prepared to study it.

248. As regards the suggestion by the Committee of Experts as to compensation to be paid to persons harmed by non-application of a Convention, the Government member of the United Kingdom considered economic and political sanctions would not only be inapplicable but would be even counter-productive by discouraging further ratifications and leading member States to question their membership of the Organization: his Government was convinced that a voluntarist approach to ratification like that prevailing in the ILO was the best way to promote standards. The Government member of India was also for reasons of principle opposed to any notion of sanctions or forcing. The Workers' member of Norway stated that such a matter should only be raised at the international level after the exhaustion of national procedures and in his view the question should be examined in the next report of the Committee of Experts.

249. The Government member of Portugal supported the suggestions of the Committee of Experts as to more active participation of national administrations and employers' and workers' organizations in the supervisory system, as did the Workers' members of Poland and Sweden, the latter of which drew special attention to the crucial role of Convention No. 144 and its ratification: recognizing the usefulness of the procedure under article 19 of the Constitution, he stressed the need for employers' and workers' organizations to take part in a regular examination of unratified Conventions at the national level, and this was required in the consultations laid down in Convention No. 144.

250. The Government members of Australia, Guinea, India and Portugal agreed with the Committee of Experts as to the promotion of standards and technical cooperation. The Government member of Guinea thought such methodology could contribute to better preparation for inevitable changes in the present environment, both in respect of attitudes and structures and especially in the area of standards relating to basic human rights. The Government member of India saw the active partnership as a new chance for technical cooperation and strengthening its synergy with standards, and this should be fully exploited. The Workers' members of Italy and Pakistan wondered specifically whether technical cooperation could be more widely used to encourage ratification of Conventions.

251. Several members of the Committee (the Government members of Guinea and India, the Workers' member of the Netherlands and the Employers' member of South Africa, who also stressed the importance of standards in the promotion of social equity in achieving balanced economic growth) called for closer collaboration between the ILO and other international organizations. Thus the Government member of India specially mention the Bretton Woods Institutions and thought the ILO should use all its authority to give due attention to the social dimension of structural economic reform: whilst labour market flexibility might be necessary for industrial modernization and restructuring, in a context of increasing economic globalization, it was also important to ensure social protection for vulnerable sections of workers against the adverse consequences of restructuring. It was thus important for the ILO to have closer relations with the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank in order to promote social justice and full employment.

252. The Government member of Belgium felt that the question of the social clause should be raised at this stage of the Conference, although it was isolated from earlier discussions. This was a controversial but a pressing matter for several reasons: synergy between international labour standards and the development of international trade, between the social and the economic, was becoming more accepted, and many people saw in it a means of improving the application of the ILO's most important Conventions, which were widely recognized as a permanent social heritage. The opportunities for cooperation presented by the World Trade Organization should be taken, since a multilateral approach to this question would ensure objectivity and the involvement of the ILO. How the social clause would be implemented remained to be seen, but in any event the prospects were exciting, as any trade agreement between partners at any level has social consequences for the parties. Such agreements should include clauses for mutual assistance and cooperation.

253. The Government members of Australia and Germany, the Workers' members of Egypt and France and the representatives of the World Federation of Trade Unions (WFTU) and the World Confederation of Labour (WCL) agreed with the Government member of Belgium: the ILO was competent to intervene and be an active partner in the debate. The Government member of Cuba was more cautious: before making a decision, the extent and detail of the proposals of the Director-General should be clarified and any new form of protectionism or trade discrimination against the weaker countries should be avoided.

254. The Workers' member of Egypt feared that making a link between international trade and standards with sanctions for countries not observing standards would not immediately affect the working class which the social clause was intended to protect. The Government member of India stated too that any interference in freedom of trade through protectionist measures on the pretext of a social clause would reduce employment opportunities and perpetuate poverty. He firmly opposed attempts to link certain labour standards to international trade and trade could not and should not be decisive on all social subjects; nor should international labour standards be applied by means of trade sanctions. The Government member of the United Kingdom also opposed any proposal as to social regulation which would make links with international commerce.

255. At the conclusion of the special day's discussion on the future of standards, the Employers' members did not wish to repeat earlier points made, given the intensity and the diversity of opinions, but referred to their opening statement which explained their position in detail. One theme which they had not taken up at all was that of the social clause, although this was particularly important in the discussion, as various statements showed. The social clause was a very old subject as the Preamble to the ILO's Constitution shows, and the ILO itself was already a sort of social clause, as this was its task originally. The new element in the present debate was the attempt to create a direct link between these objectives and the regulation of world trade. The remarks in the Director-General's Report regarding the social clause raised questions which were unanswered, especially the solution proposed at the end of the chapter, and ultimately it would be necessary to know the cost-benefit ratio. The main problem was to identify standards on which a social clause could be based, and in the present Committee the tendency had been to think only of Conventions on basic human rights. However, although such Conventions contain some basic provisions, not all their contents were fundamental and the question was thus what would be indispensable in practice, what could be accepted and how far. They wondered whether the founding principle of the ILO, namely the voluntary nature of engagements undertaken, could be maintained or should be overridden or in fact was already overridden. If there were to be practical consequences of the application of social clauses, various procedural questions would arise as to the authorities for taking decisions or imposing sanctions or, conversely, making recommendations, and a sort of judicial supervision would be necessary. If sanctions were taken, their nature and the basis for them could not be determined, so that in the Employers' view there was no reason justifying procedures for the introduction into world trade of general social clauses. Whilst trade liberalization could be limited conceivably to make it more straightforward, there was a danger that all these measures would lead to new forms of protectionism, and any protectionism would in the end damage all economic actors. The Employers' members agreed with the Director-General of the GATT, that if poverty were the cause of a higher level of social protection it would be investment and not sanctions which would present a remedy.

256. The Employers' and Workers' members welcomed the special discussion in which the three groups had made both technical and more fundamental suggestions and remarks concerning standard-setting activity and the supervisory system.

257. The Workers' members noted that the vast majority of Governments and Employers' members recognized and stressed the importance of standards as part of the ILO's mandate, and the universality of standards had been demonstrated many times during the discussion. However, it remained difficult to understand some statements or suggestions which had been made. For example, the discussions, and especially the Employers' members' statement, showed that the role of standards seemed to be doubted. Some speakers seemed to question the place of standards as "an important means but one among others", and to wonder whether the ILO should guard against regulation in present times as a means of ensuring social protection. Regulation was justified only where indispensable, as was the case at the international and the national levels, but standards must remain the heart and backbone of the ILO. The Workers' members feared that the ILO's mandate would no longer be respected if standards did not form one of its main activities, and several speakers demonstrated the crucial importance of social dialogue and tripartite participation. The difference between fundamental and priority standards and other standards was often stressed in the present Committee, while the idea of a social clause in trade and cooperation agreements had caused Employers to raise questions. It was important to note that these questions are essentially ones of form rather than substance. Attention should be drawn to constitutional principles relating to freedom of association and the right to organize applying to all member States, and the vast majority of member States have ratified Conventions Nos. 29 and 111. Further, the Employers' members, the Workers' members and several Government members had stressed the importance of the link between international labour standards and technical cooperation and assistance. The problem of ratification should not be exaggerated since the ratifications of basic Conventions such as Conventions Nos. 29, 100, 105, 111 and the priority Conventions like Nos. 81, 122, 129 and 144 were quite high. A diminishing average number of ratifications was not fatal, as in the general discussion it had been noted that 192 ratifications had been registered in the past year and the present year without taking account of ratifications by new member States. There were various suggestions and considerations as to the elaboration and the content of standards, flexibility clauses and progressivity in implementation, strengthening the supervisory system and the working methods of the present Committee, the participation of employers' and workers' organizations, the promotion of standards and technical cooperation, which confirmed this view. Nevertheless, differences of opinion continued especially as regards the respective roles of the Committee of Experts and the present Committee, and the revision of standards. As these subjects have not been exhausted, the minutes of this sitting and the part of the report of the Committee of Experts under reference should be incorporated in the Governing Body documents when standard-setting activities and the supervisory system were discussed.

E. Compliance with specific obligations

258. The Committee decided that, in examining individual cases relating to compliance by States with their obligations under or relating to international labour standards, it would apply the same working methods and criteria as last year, as amended or clarified in 1980 and 1987.

259. In applying those methods, the Committee decided, on the proposal of the Workers' members supported by the Employers' members, to invite all governments concerned by the comments in paragraphs 120 (compliance with reporting obligations), 125 (supply of first reports), 129 (lack of reply to comments of the supervisory bodies), 154 (special problems relating to submission) and 158 (lack of reports on unratified Conventions and on Recommendations) of the Committee of Experts' report to supply information to the Committee in one half-day sitting to be devoted to those cases.

260. The Committee noted that this new approach had been introduced last year on a trial basis and had produced interesting results. Nevertheless, it should in no sense be understood by governments as dispensing them from the need to take part in the Committee's discussions. The Committee noted that this year, especially due to the improvements in the procedures, the new approach could be considered successful, as it had been possible to hear most Government delegates concerned.

Submission of Conventions and Recommendations to the competent authorities

261. In accordance with its terms of reference, the Committee considered the manner in which effect is given to article 19, paragraphs 5 to 7, of the ILO Constitution. These provisions require member States within 12, or exceptionally 18, months of the closing of each session of the Conference to submit the Conventions and Recommendations adopted at that session to "the authority or authorities within whose competence the matter lies, for the enactment of legislation or other action", and to inform the Director-General of the ILO of the measures taken to that end, with particulars of the authority or authorities regarded as competent.

262. The Committee noted from the report of the Committee of Experts (paragraph 147) that considerable efforts to fulfil the submission obligation had been made in certain States, namely: Botswana, Greece, Grenada, India, Mauritius, Niger, Syrian Arab Republic, Uruguay.

263. The Committee was informed by various other States of measures taken to bring Conventions and Recommendations before the competent national authorities. It welcomed the progress achieved and expressed the hope that there would be further improvements in States that still experience difficulties in complying with their obligations.

Failure to submit

264. The Committee noted with regret from paragraph 154 of the Committee of Experts' report that no indication was available that steps had been taken in accordance with article 19 of the Constitution to submit the Conventions and Recommendations adopted between 1985 and 1991 by the 71st to 78th Sessions of the Conference[1] to the competent authorities, in the cases of Antigua and Barbuda, Cambodia, Central African Republic, Costa Rica, Djibouti, El Salvador, Jamaica, Kenya, Madagascar, Papua New Guinea, Paraguay, Saint Lucia, Seychelles, Sierra Leone, Solomon Islands, Trinidad and Tobago, United Republic of Tanzania, Zaire.

Supply of reports on ratified Conventions

265. In Part B of this report (General questions relating to international labour standards) the Committee has considered amongst other things the fulfilment by States of their obligation to report on the application of ratified Conventions. By the date of the meeting of the Committee of Experts, the percentage of reports received was 64.6, which is the lowest recorded since 1946. Since then, further reports have been received, bringing the figure to 77.2 per cent (as compared with 75.8 per cent in June 1993, 76.8 per cent in June 1992 and 83.7 per cent in June 1991). This year, the Committee of Experts noted that almost 67 per cent of the reports on Conventions for which information on practical application was requested contained such information, substantially higher than in 1991 and 1992 (50 per cent) or 1993 (56 per cent). The Committee emphasizes the importance of sending practical information, without which it is impossible to know if a Convention is actually being applied. The Committee joins the Committee of Experts in appealing to governments to make every effort to include the necessary information in future reports.

Failure to supply reports and information on the application of ratified Conventions

266. The Committee noted with regret that no reports on ratified Conventions had been supplied for two years or more by the following States: Albania, Dominica, Guinea-Bissau, Nepal, Saint Lucia, Sao Tome and Principe, Solomon Islands, Somalia.

267. The Committee also noted with regret that no first reports due since 1992 on the following ratified Conventions had been supplied by France (French Southern and Antarctic Territories) (Conventions Nos. 53, 69, 74, 92, 133 and 134), Liberia (Convention No. 133) and Nigeria (Convention No. 133). It stressed the special importance of first reports, on which the Committee of Experts bases its first evaluation of compliance with ratified Conventions.

268. In this year's report, the Committee of Experts noted that 47 governments had not communicated replies to most or any of the observations and direct requests relating to Conventions on which reports were due for examination this year, involving a total of 354 cases (compared with 318 cases last year and 330 two years ago). The Committee was informed that, since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, 25 of the governments concerned had sent replies, which would be examined by the Committee of Experts next year.

[1] The Conference did not adopt any Recommendations or Conventions at its 73rd Session (June 1987).

269. The Committee noted with regret that no information had yet been received regarding any or most of the observations and direct requests of the Committee of Experts to which replies were requested for the period ending 30 June 1993 from the following countries: Barbados, Burkina Faso, Burundi, Central African Republic, Chad, Equatorial Guinea, Gabon, Ghana, Guinea-Bissau, Haiti, Honduras, Jamaica, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Madagascar, Mozambique, Nepal, Papua New Guinea, Saint Lucia, Sao Tome and Principe, Solomon Islands, Somalia, Zaire.

270. The Committee noted the explanations provided by the Governments of the following countries concerning difficulties encountered in discharging their obligations: Barbados, Burundi, Cambodia, Central African Republic, Gabon, Ghana, Haiti, Honduras, Jamaica, Kenya, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Madagascar, Mozambique, Namibia, Nigeria, Papua New Guinea, Paraguay, Seychelles, Sierra Leone.

271. The Committee expressed extreme concern at the gravity of the situation. Without real progress, the whole supervisory mechanism risks paralysis. The obligation to transmit reports is the basis of the supervisory system. The Committee requests the Director-General to adopt all possible measures to improve the situation and solve the problems referred to above as quickly as possible. It expressed the hope in particular that the multidisciplinary teams would give top priority in their work in the field to the fulfilment of standards-related obligations.

Application of ratified Conventions

272. The Committee noted with particular interest the steps taken by a number of governments to ensure compliance with ratified Conventions. The Committee of Experts listed in paragraph 135 of its report new cases in which governments had made changes to their law and practice following comments it had made as to the degree of conformity of national legislation or practice with the provisions of a ratified Convention. There were 42 such cases, relating to 30 States and one non-metropolitan territory in all regions of the world. Over 2,000 cases of progress have been recorded since the Committee of Experts began listing them in 1964. These results are tangible proof of the effectiveness of the supervisory system.

273. At its present session, the Committee was informed of other instances in which measures had recently been or were about to be taken by governments with a view to ensuring the implementation of ratified Conventions. While it is for the Committee of Experts to examine these measures, the present Committee welcomes them as fresh evidence of the efforts made by governments to comply with their international obligations and to act upon the comments of the supervisory bodies.

274. The Committee thought it appropriate to draw the attention of the Conference to various important cases which it had to consider.

Cases of progress

275. The Committee noted with satisfaction that in a number of cases — including many involving basic human rights — governments have introduced changes in their law and practice in order to eliminate divergencies previously discussed by the Committee. It considers highlighting these cases a positive approach towards influencing governments to respond to comments of the supervisory bodies. In this respect, it refers to the report of the Committee of Experts and the discussion of individual cases which appears in Part Two of this report.

Special cases

276. The Committee considered it appropriate to draw the attention of the Conference to its discussion of the case mentioned in the following paragraph, a full record of which appears in Part Two of this report.

277. As regards the application by India of Convention No. 29, the Committee took note of the oral information furnished by the Government representative and of the developments that have taken place. It regretted that no report was furnished in time by the Government but noted that the report as well as the replies to the comments of the Committee of Experts were received in the International Labour Office on 2 June 1994. It regretted that this late despatch made it impossible for the Committee of Experts, and consequently for the Conference Committee, to consider more recent information supplied by the Government. In any event, the Committee noted that, notwithstanding the efforts made, much remained to be done to overcome the problems already discussed in the course of many earlier sessions and highlighted by the Committee of Experts concerning notably the identification, liberation and rehabilitation of persons in bonded labour, including children, as well as, in particular, the introduction of an efficient enforcement system. In this regard the Committee remained very deeply concerned by the situation. The Committee urged the Government to send its next report in time so that the Committee of Experts, as well as the Conference Committee itself, could duly examine it. Considering the conclusions it adopted last year and bearing in mind the gravity of the questions under discussion for several years now without any progress being recorded, the Committee reiterated its very deep concern. It urged the Government to spare no effort to institute the urgent and necessary measures for the elimination of debt bondage and to furnish without delay and without fail all the detailed information required by the Committee of Experts.

278. The Committee trusts that the Government concerned will take all measures necessary to correct the deficiencies noted and invites it to consider appropriate forms of ILO assistance, including direct contacts, to ensure that real progress is achieved by next year in the observance of its obligations under the ILO Constitution and the Convention in question.

Continued failure to implement

279. The Committee recalls that its working methods provide for the listing of cases of continued failure over several years to eliminate serious deficiencies, previously discussed, in the application of ratified Conventions. This year the Committee made no mention in this respect.

280. The Government of the country to which reference is made in paragraph 277 is invited to supply the relevant report and information to enable the Committee to follow up the above-mentioned matter at the next session of the Conference.

Supply of reports on unratified Conventions and on Recommendations

281. The Committee notes that 54 of the 106 article 19 reports requested on Conventions Nos. 87 and 98 were received at the time of the Committee of Experts' meeting, and a further two since, making 52.8 per cent in all.

282. The Committee noted with regret that over the past five years none of the reports on unratified Conventions and on Recommendations requested under article 19 of the Constitution had been supplied by the following: Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Namibia, Papua New Guinea, Paraguay, Saint Lucia, Seychelles, Sierra Leone, Solomon Islands, Somalia, Zaire.

Communication of copies of reports to workers' and employers' organizations

283. Once again this year, the Committee did not have to apply the criterion "The government has failed during the past three years to indicate the representative organizations of employers and workers to which, in accordance with article 23(2) of the Constitution, copies of reports and information supplied to the ILO under articles 19 and 22 have been communicated".

Participation in the work of the Committee

284. The Committee wishes to express its gratitude to the 50 governments which collaborated by providing information on the situation in their countries and participating in the discussions of their individual cases.

285. The Committee regrets that, despite repeated invitations, the Governments of the following States failed to take part in the discussions concerning their countries: Albania, Antigua and Barbuda, Burkina Faso, Djibouti, Liberia, Nepal, Sao Tome and Principe, Seychelles, Sierra Leone, Zaire. It decided to mention the cases of these States in the appropriate paragraphs of its report and to inform them in accordance with the usual practice.

286. The Committee notes with regret that the Governments of the States which were not represented at the Conference, namely Chad, Dominica, Equatorial Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Saint Lucia, Solomon Islands, Somalia, were unable to participate in the Committee's examination of the cases relating to them. It decided to mention these countries in the appropriate paragraphs of this report and to inform the governments, in accordance with the usual practice.

287. The report of this year's Committee on the Application of Standards is unusually long, but this is neither accidental nor purposeless. There are two noble and just reasons: the celebration of the 75th anniversary of the ILO, and the detailed examination of the very basic question of the state of freedom of association in the world. The very wide interest in the role and future of standards in general and especially the most basic standards has provoked a lively but thoughtful discussion which the Committee hopes will usefully contribute to the fertile discussions to which this year's celebration has given rise.

288. The 75th anniversary of the ILO and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia are particularly important, given their timing. Change in the world is commonplace and changes are of course accelerating and becoming more difficult to control and organize on the basis of universally accepted aims and values. The last ten years have seen the generalization of the market economy, liberalization of trade and globalization of the economy — all of this with considerable and recognized success and efficiency on the level of the economy. But there has also been a dramatic increase in unemployment which has become more structural, including in industrialized countries, and inequalities have increased with the spreading of poverty and new forms of poverty and the resurgence of ethnic and nationalistic conflict.

289. Commemoration is the occasion for the return to historic bases and values which have to be defended, whilst avoiding the temptation to rewrite history. At the same time, it is the occasion for reflection on the future and changes which should be made in the standard-setting sphere. This too is what the Committee has tried to do, especially on the basis of the report of the Committee of Experts.

290. Discussions in the Committee make it clear that one of the fundamental questions for several years has been the relevance of ILO standards and the constant adaption of standard-setting to the increased pace of the world economy. Criticisms based on economic arguments (labour costs, rigidities and obstacles to employment and structural adjustment) have not destroyed the consensus on this point. Workers' protection is the main purpose of international labour law. The importance of standard-setting activity in promoting development balanced in justice and freedom and inspiring social policies is still recognized, even if the need for realism and effectiveness is stressed.

291. Paradoxically, one of the features of globalization is that it does not exclude contradictory trends. The Workers' members of the Committee called on the ILO to launch a campaign for a World Charter or social platform with the aim of ratification of the ILO's fundamental Conventions by the year 2000.

292. That the social should overcome the economic was the wish expressed by Albert Thomas on the tenth anniversary of the ILO. This does not deny the inevitable dialectic between social and economic but states the humanist vocation of the ILO. Social justice is the raison-d'être of the ILO and should be its guiding light at the dawn of the third millennium.

293. After concluding its work, the Committee held a special sitting in honour of Mr. Edward J. Hickey, Workers' representative of the United States of America in the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards, who had decided to take the opportunity presented by the 75th anniversary of the ILO and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia to end his long and eminent career in the Committee. In this special sitting, many speakers expressed their admiration of Mr. Hickey's tireless and passionate devotion over 30 years' service in the Committee to the cause of international labour standards, his exceptional professional and human qualities, and the contribution he has thus made to the defence and promotion of human freedom and dignity. The Committee unanimously decided to record its deep gratitude to him.

OBSERVATIONS AND INFORMATION CONCERNING PARTICULAR COUNTRIES

I. OBSERVATIONS AND INFORMATION CONCERNING REPORTS ON RATIFIED CONVENTIONS (ARTICLE 22 OF THE CONSTITUTION)

A. General Observations and Information concerning Certain Countries

(a) Failure to supply reports on the application of ratified Conventions

The Employers' members noted that the supply of routine reports at regular intervals constituted an obligation without which no supervision could be effected. They remarked that the list of the countries had become shorter since the session of the Committee of Experts. Nevertheless, they stressed the importance of the obligation to send reports in good time because otherwise they could not be examined by the Committee of Experts. They expressed great concern over the fact that the 50 governments that had not complied with this obligation amounted to almost one-third of the total number of member States.

The Workers' members subscribed to the remarks made by the Employers' members and stressed that regular reporting was the foundation of the supervisory system. They also noted that two countries, namely Albania and Somalia were also mentioned in the same paragraph of the Committee of Experts' report last year.

The Workers' member of the United States noted the fact that none of the Governments mentioned had been present to provide information on the matter and expressed his entire agreement with the observations made by Workers' and Employers' members. He considered that the importance of the reporting obligation, which could not be over-emphasized, was not appreciated sufficiently by the Governments and, if it was not improved, the entire system could collapse.

A Government representative of Saudi Arabia considered that distinction should be made between the governments that were represented at the Conference but were not present at the Committee and those which were not represented at the Conference at all.

The Committee recalled the fundamental importance of supplying reports on the application of ratified Conventions, and of doing so within the stipulated time-limit. This obligation constituted the basis of the supervisory system, and the Committee expressed its firm hope that the Governments of Albania, Dominica, Guinea-Bissau, Nepal, St. Lucia, Sao Tome and Principe, Solomon Islands and Somalia, which have not to date submitted reports on the application of ratified Conventions, would do so as soon as possible and decided to mention these cases in the appropriate section of its General Report.

(b) Failure to supply first reports on the application of ratified Conventions

The Workers' members stressed the importance of the first reports as a basis of analysis by the Committee of Experts. They also emphasized that reports should be supplied in good time.

The Employers' members also highlighted the crucial importance of the first report and stated that the supply of a first report was not the end of an obligation but the beginning of regular reporting which was the core of the supervisory system.

A Government representative of Nigeria regretted the fact that the first report had not been sent because of technical difficulties. She assured the Committee that all efforts were being made to send the report before the next session of the Committee of Experts.

The Committee noted the information supplied and explanations given by the Government representative of Nigeria. It reiterated the crucial importance of submitting first reports on the application of ratified Conventions.

The Committee decided to mention two cases: namely Liberia and Nigeria, Convention No. 133, in the appropriate section of its General Report.

(c) Failure to supply information in reply to comments made by the Committee of Experts

The Workers' members underscored the importance of replying to comments made by the Committee of Experts as a key element in the dialogue between the Government and the supervisory bodies, without which neither the Committee of Experts nor the Conference Committee would be able to work. If a lengthy reply was supplied to the Conference Committee, it would need to be referred to the Committee of Experts and would thus interrupt the dialogue. They emphasized that such a failure would slow down the process of supervision but would not let the Government escape from supervision. They criticized strongly the supply of incomplete and unclear reports.

The Employers' members considered such a failure was a subcategory of those relating to the normal obligation to report and stated that reports with unclear or incomplete points were almost equal to no report. The figure of 353 such cases noted in paragraph 129 of the General Report was a cause for concern and, without some progress, the whole supervisory system would be put into question. This was unfair to those governments that supplied proper reports.

A Government representative of Barbados expressed his Government's regret that it was unable to supply the information due to a number of factors: the prime ones being institutional difficulties arising from structural changes in the Ministry of Labour over the last year or so. He referred to a contact that his Government had made with the ILO Office in the Caribbean for assistance so as to strengthen its capacity to respond more effectively to the requests. He assured the Committee that the available information would be submitted to the Office on his return to the country.

A Government representative of Burundi stated that, as soon as they had received the Report of the Committee of Experts, they had prepared a report and sent it to the ILO in May. He pointed out that the direct request concerning Convention No. 81 had not been received with the Report of the Committee of Experts. After referring to the efforts to repeal certain legal texts which were in contradiction with Convention No. 29, he referred to the political situation in his country since last year: the democratic elections, the assassination of the new President, and the plane accident that befell his successor. He requested the understanding of the Committee of Experts in view of these circumstances and expressed his commitment to respond to the direct request on Convention No. 81, a copy of which he had just received.

A Government representative of the Central African Republic informed the Committee that his delegation had provided to the ILO at the beginning of the Conference ten reports, namely on Conventions Nos. 17, 18, 26, 29, 41, 88, 95, 98, 105 and 118, containing information on comments of the Committee of Experts. Replies had also been sent by post on Conventions Nos. 13, 81, 100, 111, 117 and 119, which had apparently not been received by the ILO. He emphasized his Government's willingness to respect its constitutional obligations by putting in order the services responsible for the relevant questions, in the general framework of technical cooperation of the ILO.

A Government representative of Gabon stressed that the failure was not due to bad faith or to an attempt to hide anything. The period when the report forms and the Committee of Experts' comments were received coincided with the period of presidential elections, which brought to a standstill the functioning of the entire administration in his country. He assured the Committee that the reports due would be sent in good time for supervision, barring unforeseen circumstances.

A Government representative of Ghana regretted that the failure was partly due to the channel through which the information had to pass before reaching the ILO, and stated that action had been taken to correct this lapse so as to supply any information directly to the Office with copies to the Ministry responsible for labour matters. He noted that information on six out of 11 Conventions concerned had been supplied, and that efforts were being made to supply information on the remaining five Conventions as soon as possible and, in any case, before the end of the year. Ghana benefited from training programmes organized by the ILO, which would no doubt enhance their knowledge regarding the preparation, supply and submission of reports in accordance with articles 19, 22 and 35 of the Constitution.

A Government representative of Haiti stressed that he represented the legitimate Government of the country, which, however, did not exercise any real power in the country since the coup d'état of September 1991. His Government was not able to fulfil its obligations because the institutions such as the Ministries of Justice and of Social Affairs and Parliament did not function. He assured the Committee that, as soon as a legitimate constitutional order was established, all efforts would be made to comply with these obligations. He also expressed his wish that the Committee of Experts would draw particular attention to the case of Haiti by mentioning it in the appropriate part of its report.

A Government representative of Honduras stated that the Permanent Mission in Geneva had requested the Ministry of Labour to supply information to respond to the comments made by the Committee of Experts and that this information had unfortunately not yet been received. She stressed her Government's firm willingness to discharge its obligations vis-à-vis the ILO and to send reports on time. In addition, she referred to the modernization of labour legislation under way, for which the assistance of the ILO was requested.

A Government representative of Jamaica apologized for the absence of some of the reports, due to certain administrative difficulties. Referring to the assistance obtained from the ILO Office in the Caribbean, he assured the Committee that reports would in future be submitted on time.

A Government representative of Lebanon noted that her Government had submitted during 1993 the reports on 23 ratified Conventions, 20 of which had apparently been commended by the Committee of Experts for their comprehensive details. She stated that information on Conventions Nos. 81 and 98 was also supplied to the ILO in the aforementioned reports. No replies to the comments on the other Conventions could be sent because the Government had not received the related documents, such as in the case of Convention No. 90. She also considered that some cases of brief or incomplete answers to the questions raised by the Committee of Experts could be due to the fact that no major amendments had been introduced to the Labour Code of 1946. The speaker further referred to the current revision and updating of the Labour Code, to the measures taken by the Ministry of Labour to give effect to some of the provisions of the ratified Conventions by means of administrative decisions, and to the submission of 38 Conventions to the competent authorities.

A Government representative of Libyan Arab Jamahiriya noted that a reply to the observations concerning Convention No. 29 had been made by the report of the national committee that was specially established to respond to comments of the Committee of Experts and that this had been sent on 29 May 1992. The same report also responded to observations concerning labour inspection and Convention No. 88 and also concerning freedom of association and collective bargaining. As to the social security Conventions, the relevant observations had recently been submitted to the competent authority so that a reply could be prepared. The speaker pointed out that the observations were received in April 1994 and referred to delays in postal delivery caused by the air embargo. He expressed the hope that the comments of the Committee of Experts could be provided in Arabic.

The representative of the Secretary-General reminded the Committee that comments in the Arabic language had been sent systematically since 1988.

A Government representative of Madagascar stated that since 1992 his Government had made particular efforts to make up for the delay of the supply of reports and that the reports on 20 out of 25 Conventions concerned had already been sent to the ILO. After supplying information on the application of certain Conventions, he added that his Government would continue the efforts in line with the comments made by the Committee and that the other reports requested would be submitted to the ILO in the near future.

A Government representative of Mozambique stated that the delay in sending reports was due to the fact that the two officials in charge of their preparation had left the Ministry of Labour and that another official had to be trained to deal with the activities concerning standards and obligations with regard to the ILO. As regards Convention No. 81, the delegation to this Conference had submitted the report to the ILO. As to Conventions Nos. 18, 88 and 100, the reports would be supplied to the ILO as soon as the delegation returned to the country. She concluded by recalling the technical assistance that her country had received from the ILO.

A Government representative of Papua New Guinea highlighted the technical and administrative difficulties which his Government had faced in recent years and stated that they had requested the technical assistance of the ILO through the multidisciplinary team based in Manila.

The Committee took due note of the information and explanations provided by Government representatives. It stressed the great importance of communicating clear and complete information in response to comments made by the Committee of Experts. It reiterated that this was an aspect of the constitutional obligation to report. In this connection it expressed its profound concern at the extremely high number of cases of failure to supply information in reply to comments made by the Committee of Experts. It reiterated the fact that assistance from the ILO could be requested by Governments in order to overcome any difficulties they might be facing. The Committee urged the Governments concerned, namely Barbados, Burkina Faso, Burundi, the Central African Republic, Chad, Equatorial Guinea, Gabon, Ghana, Guinea-Bissau, Haiti, Honduras, Jamaica, Lebanon, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Madagascar, Mozambique, Nepal, Papua New Guinea, Saint Lucia, Sao Tome and Principe, Solomon Islands, Somalia and Zaire to spare no effort to provide the information requested as soon as possible. The Committee decided to mention all these cases in the appropriate section of its General Report.

(d) Failure to supply reports on unratified Conventions and on Recommendations

The Employers' members recalled the nature of the obligation to supply reports on unratified Conventions and on Recommendations and drew attention to paragraph 157 of the General Report of the Committee of Experts, according to which only 50 per cent of the reports requested of States that had not ratified the Conventions concerned had been received, a situation considered extremely regrettable. They urged member States to discharge their obligations in this respect, because the General Survey would otherwise have only a partial value.

The Workers' members subscribed to the comments of the Employers' members and recalled that, during the general discussion on the future of standards, the importance of General Surveys was emphasized not only as a means to obtain a clear image of the situation in different countries of the world, but also to appreciate and prepare what measures should be taken in future regarding, for instance, the possible revision of the instruments concerned. In addition, such surveys were important to dissipate miscomprehensions that hindered or slowed down the ratification of Conventions by certain countries.

A Government representative of Libyan Arab Jamahiriya stated that the necessary measures had been taken to draw the attention of the competent authorities to unratified Conventions and Recommendations.

A Government representative of Namibia stated that his country, being a young nation, was faced with numerous problems and that for the last four years his Government had tried to reinforce the institutional capacity of his country and, in particular, that of the Ministry of Labour, which now included a department that dealt directly with questions relating to the application of standards and to the ILO. He added that the fact that the employers' and workers' organizations were new, and still growing, was an additional cause of difficulty in supplying detailed reports, but that his Government hoped that it would be able to discharge its obligations towards the Committee of Experts with the above-mentioned measures.

The Employers' member of Namibia stated that the Namibian Employers' Federation and its constituent employer associations were actively involved in the development of a tripartite system, based on the notion of participatory democracy, freedom of association and collective bargaining. The Labour Act of 1992 had established a framework for, and encouraged a pluralist system of, industrial relations, putting into effect the principles contained in the nation's Constitution. Although Namibia had not formally ratified Conventions Nos. 87 and 98, he reassured the Committee that in spirit these Conventions were being honoured and applied in his country.

A Government representative of Papua New Guinea stated that his Government was faced with administrative difficulties. He took note of the comments by the Committee of Experts and hoped to comply with ILO obligations in the future.

The Employers' members stated that the Committee should make clear the significance attached to the formal reporting obligations because if this was not done the supervisory machinery would be unable to function. Under the new simplified reporting system, they hoped that governments would fulfil these obligations and that there would be fewer cases of unfulfilled obligations. They noted a certain improvement in relation to last year in the number of governments appearing before the Committee, but the situation was still worrisome. The accumulation of all of these cases in one single session should not serve as an excuse for governments not to appear before the Committee. They asked that those governments that had not appeared be referred to in an appropriate section of the report of the Committee.

best copy available

The Workers' members endorsed the Employers' members statement in its entirety.

The Committee noted the information and explanations supplied by Government representatives and other speakers. The Committee emphasized the importance it attached to the constitutional obligation to send reports on unratified Conventions and Recommendations. In fact, these reports made possible a better evaluation of the situation within the context of the general surveys of the Committee of Experts. The Committee insisted that all member States should fulfil their obligations in this respect and expressed the firm hope that the Governments of the following States: Solomon Islands, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Namibia, Papua New Guinea, Paraguay, St. Lucia, Seychelles, Sierra Leone, Somalia and Zaire, would fulfil their obligations under article 19 of the Constitution in the future. The Committee decided to mention these cases in the appropriate section of its General Report.

(e) Written information received up to the end of the meeting of the Committee on the Application of Standards[1]

Algeria. Since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, the Government has sent the reports due on certain Conventions and the replies to most of the Committee's comments.

Belize. Since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, the Government has sent the reports due on certain Conventions and the replies to most of the Committee's comments.

Burundi. Since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, the Government has sent the reports due on certain Conventions and the replies to most of the Committee's comments.

Cameroon. Since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, the Government has sent the first report due on Convention No. 106 and the replies to most of the Committee's comments.

Comoros. Since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, the Government has sent the reports due on certain Conventions and the replies to most of the Committee's comments.

Congo. Since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, the Government has sent the reports due on certain Conventions and the replies to most of the Committee's comments.

Côte d'Ivoire. Since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, the Government has sent the first report due on Convention No. 133.

France. Since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, the Government has sent the first report due on Convention No. 133.

Grenada. Since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, the Government has sent the reports due on certain Conventions and the replies to most of the Committee's comments.

Guatemala. Since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, the Government has sent the reports due on certain Conventions and the replies to most of the Committee's comments.

Guinea. Since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, the Government has sent the reports due on certain Conventions and the replies to most of the Committee's comments.

Guyana. Since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, the Government has sent the reports due on certain Conventions and the replies to most of the Committee's comments.

Honduras. The Government regrets to inform the Committee that this year it has not sent its delegation to the International Labour Conference because of very strict measures of economic austerity and that only two officials of the Permanent Mission are covering the Conference. For this reason it is not possible to present the requested comments. However, the request has been sent to the Ministry of Labour of Honduras and as soon as an answer is available the delegation will comply with the request.

India. Since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, the Government has sent the reports due on certain Conventions and the replies to most of the Committee's comments.

Israel. Since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, the Government has sent the reports due on certain Conventions and the replies to most of the Committee's comments.

Liberia. Since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, the Government has sent the reports due on certain Conventions and the replies to most of the Committee's comments.

Malawi. Since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, the Government has sent the reports due on certain Conventions and the replies to most of the Committee's comments.

Mongolia. Since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, the Government has sent the reports due on certain Conventions and the replies to most of the Committee's comments.

Panama. Since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, the Government has sent the reports due on certain Conventions and the replies to most of the Committee's comments.

Sao Tome and Principe. The Government communicated the following information:

In 1991, Sao Tome and Principe has witnessed moments of great socio-economic changes that have culminated with the accomplishment of free and just legislative and presidential elections. These changes have resulted in structural modifications, e.g. the personnel of the Ministry of Labour that attended to sending the reports and answers to the direct requests and observations in the reports of the ILO's Committee of Experts has decided to work permanently in the trade union organizations, which leaves the Ministry without competent personnel to carry out these duties. It therefore has become necessary to train new officials in this field. This year, with the support of the ILO, officials of the present Ministries of Justice, of Labour and Public Administration had participated in a training course on international labour standards in the Turin Centre. During this seminar an examination of the situation of Sao Tome and Principe has been undertaken together with the various ILO trainers, with respect to its obligations towards the ILO; all the necessary forms to enable Sao Tome and Principe to honour its obligations as an ILO member State have been furnished. The Government is convinced that from now on it will be in a position to follow all ILO activities and to honour the corresponding obligations.

The Government considers that in July it will be possible to ensure that the ILO receives the outstanding reports. Concerning practical application of Act No. 1/90 respecting social security and of Act No. 6/92 respecting individual labour conditions, as far as the list of occupational diseases is concerned, the Government will take the necessary measures to request technical assistance from the ILO, to put the provisions of the above legal texts into conformity with Convention No. 18: Workmen's Compensation (Occupational Diseases), 1925.

Singapore. Since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, the Government has sent the reports due on certain Conventions and the replies to most of the Committee's comments.

Syrian Arab Republic. Since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, the Government has sent the replies to certain of the Committee's comments.

Thailand. Since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, the Government has sent the replies to certain of the Committee's comments.

Yemen. Since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, the Government has sent the first reports due on Conventions Nos. 122, 156 and 158.

Convention No. 5: Minimum Age (Industry), 1919

Lesotho (ratification: 1966). A Government representative said that the use in the Government's report of the word "reluctant" with regard to the implementation of legislation to apply the Convention was not intended to suggest that the Inspectorate Division did not desire to implement existing provisions of the law relating to minimum age, but instead was intended to convey the difficulties encountered by the Inspectorate in establishing whether young persons were employed in industrial and commercial undertakings. Possible reasons for this difficulty included the interest of parents that children who had left school be employed in the absence of alternative education, the desire of employers to avoid restrictions connected with the employment of young persons, and economic considerations in a situation of high unemployment. He insisted that legislation in his country was in conformity with the Convention. For reasons similar to those referred to above, very few registers were kept by employers of all persons under the age of 16 years employed by them, and he was unaware of the existence of any employment of persons under the minimum age.

The Employers' members said that there were three problems: the requirements of the Convention in minimum age matters and its compliance through legislation in Lesotho; the application in practice of these requirements; and the keeping of a register of employment of youths under 16 years of age. The Government representative now tried to correct what the Government had previously stated in its report. The most important matter was the application of the Convention in practice. They understood the difficulties experienced by countries where there was poverty in applying a Convention requiring a minimum age for employment, because if youths and children were not given an opportunity to work this might endanger the livelihood of their families. However, while taking these difficulties into account, they nevertheless asked that legislation and practice be brought into conformity with the Convention.

The Workers' members regretted that there had not been any follow-up to the detailed report for the period 30 June 1994. They indicated that the Convention was very important because under Article 2, employment of children under 14 years of age was prohibited in the industrial sector. According to the report of the Committee of Experts, this Convention seemed to be respected in law and the observations of the experts related only to the practice in Lesotho. In this regard, the Government itself had pointed out that the Labour Inspectorate was reluctant to apply Section 2 because to do so might deprive the families of youths of their livelihood. Problems connected with minimum wage necessitated the application of other measures. In this sense, the Workers' members referred to the necessity for an education policy, a family policy, the fight against poverty, and the setting of minimum wages. Therefore a coherent policy was necessary to prevent child labour in practice, as well as a political will to wage a fight against poverty. They specified that the Convention prohibited child labour in industry, and not in other sectors. With regard to the register for youths of less than 16 years of age in employment, some matters had been neglected and, given the importance of the subject, it was necessary to avoid such neglect. In this respect, they requested the Government to respond to the request of the Committee of Experts by providing information on measures that were contemplated or taken. They also asked for details regarding the number of children affected by the application of the Convention. Finally, given the importance of the Convention, they insisted on the necessity that it be respected.

The Workers' member of Lesotho expressed the hope that the newly elected Government would bring legislation and practice into conformity with the Convention. He suggested that the high taxes applied to poor workers be reduced so that they would be able to take care of their families. In this way, children under the minimum age in such families would not need to work. He also noted that most workers under the minimum age were female, and when required to work at night, they were exposed to the risks of attacks or rape upon leaving work to return home.

The Workers' member of Ghana noted that the Labour Code, which obliged an employer to keep a register of all persons under the age of 16 years employed by him, did not prevent the employment of persons below the minimum age. He expressed strong concern about the employment of children and supported the universal application of ILO standards in this matter. In his view, the problem of unemployment should not be resolved at the expense of these standards. He concluded by asking that the Government take measures to bring its legislation and national practice into conformity with the Convention.

The Workers' member of Zimbabwe stated that workers were asking that a social clause be included in international trade agreements because of such problems as the employment of child labour, which was particularly inappropriate in view of the high unemployment rate in Africa. He asked that the Government take measures to bring legislation and practice into conformity with the Convention, which would then allow for the elimination of child labour.

The Government representative reiterated that there was no conflict between the legislation of his country and the Convention, and that he was unaware that any children under the minimum age provided for by the Convention were employed in commercial and industrial establishments.

In light of all the statements that had been made, the Committee noted the information provided by the Government representative and the discussion that ensued. The Committee took note that the discrepancies continued to exist, in particular between practice and certain provisions of the Convention. Noting that the Government confirmed its commitment to remedy the situation, the Committee expressed the firm hope that the Government would quickly take all necessary measures to ensure full compliance with the Convention, above all in practice. The Committee hoped to be able to note decisive progress in the very near future, in particular on the basis of the detailed report that the Government was requested to submit this year.

Convention No. 17: Workmen's Compensation (Accidents), 1925

Kenya (ratification: 1964). A Government representative indicated that the present Workmen's Compensation Act, Chapter 236, Laws of Kenya, was first enacted in 1949, and has since been amended several times, the latest amendment having been made in 1987 aiming at providing more benefits to workers in view of the present-day high rate of inflation and the rise in the cost of living. In 1990, following the detailed discussion by the Tripartite Labour Advisory Board, the Government had decided to replace the above Act with the proposed Work Injury Benefits (Insurance) Scheme. The main aims of the proposed changes were: (i) to ensure that all workers were insured against employment accidents; (ii) to convert the present lump-sum payment into periodical payments, in conformity with the requirements of Article 5 of the Convention, as pointed out by the Committee of Experts; (iii) to improve on the present scale of medical aid and supply and repair of surgical appliances; and (iv) to increase the level of benefits in keeping with the rising cost of living generally. The Government representative recalled that the original text of the proposed legislation was sent to the ILO for detailed study and advice in order to make sure that the final text to be submitted to Parliament was in full conformity with the relevant provisions of the Convention. As a result of the comments made by the Committee of Experts and by the Office, the Government found it necessary to revise the original text of the proposed Work Injury Benefits (Insurance) Scheme in order to ensure full harmony between this legislation and Convention No. 17. In particular, the latest comments of the Committee of Experts concerned the following areas, all of which have been sufficiently covered in the new draft Bill: (i) Article 2 of the Convention which covers compensation of industrial accidents for workers ordinarily employed outside but temporarily employed in Kenya by an employer who carries on business chiefly outside Kenya; (ii) Article 5 of the Convention concerning the payment of lump-sum compensation only when the degree of incapacity does not exceed 20 per cent recommended by the Committee of Experts; (iii) Article 7 where the incapacity required a payment for the services of a constant helper; (iv) Articles 9 and 10 concerning compensation for expenses for medical, surgical, pharmaceutical and hospital treatment, and the supply and replacement of artificial limbs and surgical appliances. The views expressed by the Committee of Experts in its 1994 report would be carefully considered before the final Bill was passed into law, and his Government would undertake to ensure that the necessary amendments were effected in the proposed Work Injury Benefit (Insurance) Scheme in order to give better compliance to Articles 2, 5, 7, 9 and 10 of the Convention.

The Workers' members stated that while this case had not been previously discussed in this Committee, there had been observations and direct requests made by the Committee of Experts for many years since 1967. For many years the Government had recognized that national legislation was not in conformity with various provisions of the Convention and already in 1991 it had expressed the intention to immediately bring its legislation up to date in accordance with the requirements of Articles 5, 9 and 10 of the Convention. In its report of 1994, the Government stated that it was necessary to once again submit the draft legislation to the Tripartite Labour Advisory Board and confirmed its will to put the legislation into full conformity with the Convention. Acknowledging these facts, the Workers' members pointed out that various aspects of the draft legislation still gave rise to important problems in relation to the Convention: section 22 of the draft Bill concerning the exclusion of workers temporarily employed in Kenya, with respect to Article 2 of the Convention; section 48 concerning the payment of compensation in the form of a lump sum in place of periodical payments, with respect to Article 5 of the Convention; sections 4 and 50 which did not explicitly take into account the situation in which the death of a victim of an industrial accident occurred after the accident, with respect to Article 5 of the Convention; section 57 setting time-limits for the payment of additional compensation in cases where help of another person was required, with respect to Article 7 of the Convention; section 69 which fixed the maximum amounts for the reimbursement of medical, hospital and other expenses, with respect to Articles 9 and 10 of the Convention prohibiting such limits; section 36 laying down a three-day waiting period, with respect to Article 9 of the Convention. It was evident and it was recognized by the Government itself that the eventual approval by the authorities of the present draft legislation would only bring about a very partial solution to the problems of non-application of the Convention. In conclusion, the Workers' members insisted that the Government should comply with the observations of the Committee of Experts and that it should provide precise information. They also supported the suggestion made by the experts concerning the possibility of using the technical assistance of the Office.

The Employers' members recalled that, since 1981, there had been observations made by the Committee of Experts on this subject, and that in 1991 the Government had provided written statements to this Committee which, however, had not been discussed at the time. Referring to the detailed indications given by the Workers' members concerning discrepancies between the domestic legislation in Kenya and the requirements of the Convention, the Employers' members stressed that apart from the minor amendments which were required, there was a need for some significant modification of the legislation. Already in 1991, the Government indicated that it was prepared to meet all the requirements of the Committee of Experts in order to fully implement the Convention, and now the point had been reached where these promises needed to be fulfilled. The Employers' members associated themselves with the comments made by the Workers' members and by the Committee of Experts and emphasized that, if necessary, the assistance of the Office should be requested in order to ensure an expeditious and comprehensive solution of the existing problems.

The Government representative assured the Committee that he had taken very careful note of all the views and points raised during the discussion which would be conveyed to his Government for careful study and further necessary remedial action and, if need be, for further technical assistance in finalizing the matter.

The Committee took note of the information provided by the Government representative as well as of the discussion which took place. The Committee noted that certain measures were envisaged but stressed that specific action had yet to be undertaken in such a way as to eliminate all discrepancies noted by the Committee of Experts, thus giving full effect, in law and in practice, to the relevant provisions of the Convention. In this respect the Committee also took note of the willingness of the Government to remedy the situation. The Committee reminded the Government that it would be useful to avail itself of the technical assistance which could be provided by the Office. The Committee hoped that it would be able to note substantial progress in the very near future.

Convention No. 26: Minimum Wage-Fixing Machinery, 1928

China (ratification: 1930). The Government supplied the following information:

The Ministry of Labour of the People's Republic of China issued the Provisions on Minimum Wages in Enterprises on 24 November 1993. The Provisions apply in enterprises of all categories, including state-owned, foreign invested and private enterprises, as well as to wage-earners employed in these enterprises (Article 2). According to the Provisions, the governments at provincial levels shall, under the guidance of the national competent authority, fix unified minimum wage rates or, where necessary, different minimum wage rates for different areas or industries, which are applicable to their provinces respectively (Articles 6, 9). The Provisions provide that the governments shall consult with employers' and workers' organizations concerned in fixing minimum wages (Article 6).

With regard to the implementation of minimum wage rates, the Provisions request that enterprises should notify their employees about the applicable rates fixed by the governments as well as about all matters concerned (Article 18); wages paid by enterprises to workers should not be less than those prescribed by the minimum wage rates applicable to the enterprises (Article 19); the labour administration of governments at all levels shall be responsible for the inspection of the application of minimum wage rates (Article 22); and trade unions at various levels shall have the right to supervise the implementation of minimum wage rates and ask competent authorities to solve the problems concerned (Article 22).

In regard to sanctions for the failure to comply with minimum wage rates, the Provisions provide for economic penalties to enterprises and employers and for the payment of compensation to workers by different ratios (Articles 26, 27).

Measures are being taken to prepare the implementation of the Provisions at present. The competent labour authorities at provincial levels are fixing their own minimum wage rates and are preparing methods of implementation according to the Provisions. Some provinces and cities including Shanghai, Guangdong (Guangzhou, Shenzhen and Zhuhai), Sichuan (Deyang) had issued their minimum wage rates and put them into force by the end of 1993. The work is accelerating in other provinces and cities as well.

In addition, a Government representative stated that the Government had made a serious study of the comments of the Committee of Experts. She emphasized their positive attitude of cooperation which was shown in the written reply to the ILO, for which the opinions of China's employers' and workers' organizations had been solicited. She recalled that during the time of the planned economy, reasonable minimum wages had been guaranteed administratively by the Government, based on unified regulations, which established a wage-fixing system by grade, according to circumstances. She noted that such a system was no longer used because of the transition to a market economy. The Government representative emphasized that, with the growth of China's economy and the progress of reform, the country was placing more emphasis on the role of labour legislation in protecting the basic rights of the workers. She mentioned the regulations concerning the fixing of minimum wages in enterprises of 24 November 1993, formulated after extensive consultations with the workers' and employers' organizations, which had entered into force upon the date of issue and which were applicable nationwide. The purpose of these provisions was to meet the demand of the growing socialist market economy, to ensure that workers and their families enjoyed basic living conditions, and to promote equality between workers and fair competition among enterprises. The Government had already submitted the text of these provisions to the Committee of Experts. In addition to the provisions concerning the fixing of minimum wage rates, and inspection and economic penalties for non-payment of the minimum wage, she stated that the regulations required the minimum wage rate to correspond to between 40 to 60 per cent of the average rate of wages in the region concerned. She added that, in the case of non-compliance, the regulations empowered the labour authorities to order the unpaid wage to be made up and to impose on employers and responsible persons the obligation to pay compensation to the workers, which ranged from 20 to 100 per cent of their wages depending on the period of non-payment. The Government representative stressed that provincial governments were formulating their own minimum wage rates, and that some of them had already issued and implemented those rates before the end of 1993: these provinces and cities included Guangdong (including the cities of Shenzhen, Zhuhai and Guang Zhou), Sichuan, Shanxi, Fujian, Gansu and Shanghai; other provinces and cities were engaged in the same process. The Government was confident that, with the strengthening and improving of China's labour laws, the rights of Chinese workers to minimum wages would be better protected.

The Employers' members pointed out that this was the first time ever that a case concerning China had been discussed in the Committee and thanked the Government representative for the detailed information. They expressed interest in receiving more information, in the form of a written report, about the principles of a minimum wage, the mechanism for its implementation in practice, and as to how the minimum wage fixing mechanism works in practice. They wondered whether the provisions had already entered into force, or whether they were only being implemented by stages. In the latter case, it was important to know when the regulations would come into force fully. It was hoped that the Government would submit a more detailed report for examination by the Committee of Experts so that the Conference Committee might, if appropriate, take up this matter again in the future.

The Workers' members drew the Committee's attention to the fact that this Convention had been ratified by China already in 1930 but the first provisions concerning minimum wages in enterprises had been adopted only on 24 November 1993. However, it was at least possible to see a change in the attitude of the Government to the extent that a report had been supplied for examination by the Committee of Experts and information had been made available concerning the application of the Convention. In addition, they noted that the Government had undertaken the commitment, during the general discussion, to attach more importance to international labour standards. The Workers' members also noted the information concerning the economic reforms taking place and observed that the legislative framework, at least in the field of labour, had not been adapted to the challenges of a market economy and several questions remained. The Government should consult the 1992 General Survey on minimum wages with a view to better applying the Convention. The five principal points they raised were: (1) the period of time needed for the execution of the measures provided for in the regulations of 24 November 1993 and the possibility for the workers to invoke those provisions; (2) their practical application in small– and medium-sized enterprises, in the export processing zones and to young workers and women; (3) the existence of a supplementary system where provinces did not fix minimum wages; (4) the intervention of inspectors in workplaces in export processing zones and in rural villages; and (5) the effective consultation with organizations truly representative of workers and employers, as well as the possibility for them to negotiate minimum wages at the enterprise level. Finally, they referred to Case No. 1652 examined by the Committee on Freedom of Association and requested the Government to furnish detailed information on all these outstanding points.

The Workers' member of the United States stressed that the Committee should not be satisfied with simple indications by the Government of the manner in which it intended to apply the Convention. In addition, he referred to the state of minimum wages in China, where, for instance in the export processing zones, excessively low rates of the minimum wage in various cities, and the non-payment of even such minimum wages have been observed. He underlined the importance of real effective trade unions to the application of this Convention. He stated that consideration of this issue must take place against the backdrop of what he considered to be repression by the Chinese Government of free trade unions, suppression of collective bargaining and the use of prison and forced labour. He reiterated that it was not sufficient for the Government to make new laws and proposals and urged the Government to take measures to ensure effective enforcement of the new provisions and to change the general practice in the field of minimum wages.

The Workers' member of China stated that the Chinese trade unions were pleased with the examination by the Committee of the application of this Convention in China. He also pointed out that his organization had made studies on minimum wages in China and their results had been published in the union press. In addition, he referred to the new regulations on minimum wages, and emphasized particular aspects such as those concerning consultation with the employers' and workers' organizations; the role that such organizations could play as regards the supervision of minimum wage rates; and the role of the competent authorities in applying sanctions for the non-observance of such rates, and in resolving conflicts on the subject. He stated that the Chinese trade unions were satisfied with the provisions of the regulation. As to the better application of the Convention, the unions had urged the authorities, and especially the provincial governments, to work out minimum wage rates according to their situations in their own localities. He was pleased to confirm that the Chinese trade unions had always participated actively in the promotion and formulation of the new regulation.

The Government representative wished to make it clear that the provisions in question were too recent to accumulate supplementary data on the subject, but that her Government would later provide all the requested information to the Committee of Experts in writing. She stated that her Government would continue to take the necessary measures to ensure equality for workers and the basic improvement of their conditions of life, to assist enterprises to improve their management methods and so ensure their financial well-being, and to ensure the payment of wages from a special fund created for this purpose. She referred to the legislation concerning enterprises in financial debit, which provided for unemployment benefits to be paid to the workers of those companies. New labour legislation had been submitted to the National People's Assembly for discussion and the Government hoped to promulgate the legislation this year. She emphasized the importance attached by her country to the application of ILO standards and stated that the texts of international labour Conventions had been translated into Chinese, which should contribute to their better application.

The Committee noted the written information and the oral explanations provided by the Government representative and the discussion which took place in the Committee. It also noted that provisions had recently been promulgated by the Government to ensure the legislative conformity with the requirements of the Convention. The Committee hoped that the rapid implementation of these provisions would ensure conformity with the Convention in practice in as short a time as possible. The Committee requested the Government to supply the Committee of Experts with complete and detailed written information on all the questions raised by the ILO's supervisory bodies. The Committee hoped to be able in the near future to note tangible progress in law and in practice, with respect to the application of the Convention.

Convention No. 29: Forced Labour, 1930

India (ratification: 1954). A Government representative stated that his Government had just completed and sent the report requested for the period ending 30 June 1993. He indicated the difficulties that his country faced because of the time required for assembling the information requested by the Committee of Experts. This explained the delay in sending the report. The speaker, referring to the conclusions of the Group of Experts of the Planning Commission, indicated that there had been an appreciable reduction of the number of persons in extreme poverty, notably in the rural areas. In view of the fact that bonded labour resulted from feudal agrarian relations, this should have a direct effect on reducing the incidence of bonded labour. He also pointed out that the National Sample Survey Organization (NSSO) had accepted the proposition of the Ministry of Labour to gather information on bonded labour in work to be undertaken in 1998-99. The Ministry of Labour has continued to request States to combat bonded labour in all sectors including mining, brick-making, and sectors highlighted by the National Commission of Rural Labour. A committee made up of Secretaries of Labour of five states had submitted a proposal in the form of a report defining bonded labour and ways of measuring it. As to the Vigilance Committees, the speaker cited the number of these organs created at the district and subdivision levels: 50 and 110 in Bihar; 45 and 209 in Madhya Pradesh; 30 and 92 in Rajasthan; 13 and 58 in Orrissa. He also pointed out that in the State of Maharashtra, the Government considered that voluntary organizations tended to exaggerate the situation and that in this State 1,300 of 1,380 bonded labourers had already been rehabilitated. In Tamil Nadu, the Vigilance Committees were being reconstituted and information on the situation in Andhra Pradesh was being collected. His Government had always taken the opinions expressed by the Conference Committee and the Committee of Experts very seriously. The Central Government was at present reviewing the matter with state governments and they were formulating suggestions for improving the situation and for accelerating the rehabilitation of bonded labourers. The question of creating a National Commission on Bonded Labour was being examined by a Committee of State Ministers of Labour headed by the Minister of Labour of Maharashtra. His Government maintained, however, that better application of the existing legislation would suffice to eliminate this practice. As concerned the cases launched, and the convictions and measures taken against those found guilty of holding bonded labourers, his Government was concerned that punitive action in this domain could be counter-productive. Such action might dissuade guilty parties from collaborating with the Government in identifying the existing number of people in bondage. In addition, considering that judicial powers were independent, administrative authorities could not prescribe a time limit for the conclusion of legal procedures. Out of the total of 2,305 cases, 1,031 were acquitted, 1,190 were found guilty and 84 cases were pending. These numbers demonstrated the seriousness with which the Government was attacking the problem. Because of the complexity of the issues involved, the situation could not be resolved only through legal means. The Government was also trying to progressively do away with child labour, and a legal proposal had been elaborated to abolish differential minimum wages for children, adolescents and adults. This move was aimed at dissuading employers from employing children. He also cited figures illustrating the increase, in the course of the last two years, of the number of inspections, and of the prosecutions and convictions which have resulted from the application of the Child Labour Prohibition and Regulation Act. Central Government had requested the states to accord particular importance to the rehabilitation of bonded child labourers and, if and when they were found, to take into consideration information circulated in the press and complaints presented by voluntary organizations and other groups with a view to prompt follow-up action.

The Employers' members noted the number of times this case had been taken up during the last ten years. They regretted that the report of the Government had arrived too late to be examined by the Committee of Experts and thus there was no basis to examine the case concretely in the Conference Committee. The Employers' members did not underestimate the problems of ridding the country of bonded labour and bonded child labour. Nonetheless, for the past ten years they had consistently heard that: (1) there were problems of identification and defining bonded labour; (2) vigilance committees essentially did not exist or were inoperative or were ineffective; (3) there was a whole series of problems associated with the rehabilitation of forced labour; and (4) there was a low number of prosecutions. They deplored the fact that, in spite of all the declarations of good intentions, the situation was not improving. Fifteen requests for information had been made by the Committee of Experts to the Government. This seemed to indicate that the Government regarded the obligation as a purely bureaucratic and routine exercise. The Employers' members stated that bonded labour remained a significant fact of life in India. The problem was serious since it touched between a quarter of a million and 5 million persons in a country which had ratified the Convention 40 years ago. The actions being undertaken were not very effective. There was, first, a clearly fundamental problem of an ongoing, credible public awareness programme; and second, it was evident, given the dimensions of the problem, that there was not really an effective prosecution and enforcement of laws prohibiting bondage. The Employers' members stated that it was critical that India focus intensely on this problem and, as an urgent matter, do something concrete to end bonded labour and bonded child labour.

The Workers' members agreed with the statement of the Employers that this was an old problem. It was difficult to grasp the problem, because the report requested had not been communicated for examination by the Committee of Experts. Even though a report had now been received, the lateness of its receipt meant it was unavailable as the basis for a discussion by the Conference Committee. They observed that the problem here concerned more than that of child labour. It was every possible type and category of bonded child labour. Virtually every economic sector in India was involved, and all types of abuse of children were practised. The Committee of Experts pointed out that the children were exploited because they were young and defenceless. They have been deprived of a normal childhood, education, a future and perhaps their own lives in certain cases. The Committee of Experts' report noted that the Asian Regional Seminar on Children and Bondage in 1992 concluded that the struggle against child bondage required firm political commitments, a clear and unambiguous statement against bondage, comprehensive national policy, a programme of action covering legislative reforms, effective enforcement and a system of compulsory and free education sustained by community mobilization and information campaigns. In 1993, the Conference Committee was told that the National Child Labour Advisory Committee had begun two national projects for the complete elimination of child labour. The Conference Committee had now been told that there was a bill for an amendment to abolish differential minimum wages legislation for children, adolescents and adults. The Conference Committee had been given no sense that anything was going on. The Committee of Experts was entitled to request information on the implementation of the two national projects. According to the Workers, the Government had pointed out that there was an experiment on economic reform under way which had reduced rural poverty which, in turn, would reduce bonded and child labour. But if the total elimination of poverty in India was required before child labour could be abolished, then child labour would never disappear in India. The Conference Committee was told in June 1993 that there would be statistics on the numbers of bonded and child labour by September 1993. Now the Workers observed that the national sample survey would not treat the subject before 1998. The National Commission on Rural Labour had recommended that there should be a National Commission on Bonded Labour. But the National Human Rights Commission, established in October 1993, was to deal with the issues involved. However, the scope of activity of this Commission was limited to violations of human rights committed by agents of the State. It did not deal with private individuals or companies. The Conference Committee had now been told that the issue was being reconsidered. The Workers' members pointed out that, unless something was done about child labour quickly in India, there may well be an international boycott of Indian goods. They pointed out that in 1993, the Conference Committee urged the Government to provide a detailed report with all necessary information to the Committee of Experts. It was hoped that the question could be taken up again and a report of substantial progress would be made. Earlier discussions referred to the use of the special paragraph, not only for very serious cases but also for continued failure to observe a Convention or where a Government repeatedly ignored the requests made by the Conference Committee. In the present case, it was not only terribly serious, but no progress had occurred and the Government had not submitted the requested information. The Workers requested the Employers to seriously consider joining them in asking that the case be cited in a special paragraph of the Committee's General Report.

The Workers' member from Norway, speaking in the name of workers from Denmark, Finland and Sweden, deplored the attitude of the Government concerning the provision of information requested by the Committee of Experts. He considered that the citation of this case in a special paragraph would be justified for several reasons. In 1992 the Government communicated certain information orally to the Conference Committee. This did not permit the Conference Committee to examine in detail the grave situation of bonded and forced labour, including that of children. This was due to the fact that the information was not communicated in a written form to the Committee of Experts. The Conference Committee requested the Government to send the information required. In 1993, the Conference Committee took note in its conclusions of the fact that the Government had again ignored this request. The situation was repeated again this year, 16 years after the adoption of the law on the abolition of bonded labour. The Committee of Experts had not received the information requested. Such actions justify the citation of this case in a special paragraph.

The Workers' member of Greece stated that a recent report of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions estimated that between 100 and 200 million child labourers were working in the world. This attested to the negligence of governments concerning this problem. Without totally negating the sincerity of the Government in attacking the problem, the speaker criticized it for consistently not submitting a report, or for submitting it too late for consideration by the Conference Committee. He recalled that according to statistics assembled by two Indian trade unions, several million children between the ages of 3 and 14 were exploited in India. The number of unemployed persons in the country was roughly equivalent to this figure. The speaker noted the possibility, as a concrete measure, to begin a campaign of information to consumers calling for a boycott of products from countries which tolerated these inadmissible practices. Referring to the absence of a response on the part of the Government to questions posed by the Committee of Experts concerning penalties to those responsible for the exploitation of children, notably concerning the ridiculously low level of fines foreseen, the speaker was ready to listen to all explanations the Government might wish to offer on how to remedy this situation. He gave his full support to the proposal of his group to cite the case in a special paragraph.

The Government member of Germany deplored the fact that the report had arrived so late. He conceded nevertheless that a report had in fact been presented and that the Committee of Experts could examine it next year. He pointed out that the Committee of Experts had taken note of the report on the commencement of the International Programme for the Elimination of Child Labour (IPEC) which pointed out that there had been a change of conscience in central government, state governments and in diverse sectors of society on questions related to child labour. Concerning the proposal to cite the case in a special paragraph, he proposed that, in view of the fact that a report had indeed been sent, this paragraph should deal with India's neglect to send the report requested in a timely manner.

The Workers' member of the United States appreciated the comments of the Government member of Germany, but wished to point out that the problem was more than one of the existence of a report or of timely reporting. There had been a lack of progress on this issue since 1984. The Conference Committee discussed this case in 1986, 1989, 1991, 1992 and 1993. Despite the continuous lack of progress, the case had never been cited in a special paragraph. This was the first time a special paragraph had been proposed.

The Workers' member of Japan pointed out that he was not an expert on bonded labour in India, and he had relied on the report of the Committee of Experts. While he found this case similar to that of Thailand, it was much more serious. The picture painted by the Government member did not respond to reality. The Government had mentioned acts and legislation which were supposed to prohibit bonded labour, but according to the Committee of Experts they were useless or ineffective. There had been little if any progress, and the Vigilance Committees being established at the district and sub-division levels in India were either not constituted or powerless. Punishments had been applied to very few people, and they were meaninglessly small. The Government refused the involvement of trade unions in seeking a solution. The speaker fully supported citing the case in a special paragraph.

The Government representative, in responding to the various interventions, first dealt with the question of child labour, a phenomenon which, in his opinion, did not exist only in developing countries. He cited several examples from developed as well as developing countries from an ILO publication entitled the World Labour Report, published in 1992. While he considered that child labour should be eliminated, this problem had its origins in different economic factors such as the feudal agrarian system, poverty, the deficiencies of the educational system and training. It was a multidimensional problem which necessitated a multidimensional solution. With respect to the considerations expressed by the Employers' members as to the progress made and their worry that the actions taken were limited purely to a bureaucratic exercise, the Government representative reiterated the commitment of his Government to resolving the problems. This was illustrated by the statistics he gave in his preceding intervention concerning prosecutions and convictions against those responsible for forced labour. He insisted that given the size of the problem a solution would require immense effort. This effort, however, must be deployed in a democratic manner, and he underlined the progress that had occurred in the change of conscience concerning the problem on the part of the Government, non-governmental and voluntary organizations and the press. Referring to the intervention of the Workers' members, he reaffirmed his Government's regret for having sent the report late. The Government was committed to complying with the obligations of the supervisory sytem. He reiterated what he had expressed in his preceding intervention concerning the Committee of Ministers of Labour of different States. Their report would permit a better definition of bonded labour and better methods for combating it. In conclusion, the Government representative declared that the question of child labour must not be linked to questions of trade and the imposition of sanctions as this would not contribute to their resolution. The situation must be examined in all of its complexity. Account must be taken of difficulties facing developing countries and the manner in which these countries attempted to face these problems. India has been searching for new avenues to resolve the problems in the areas of education, health and training so as to liberate the children from their state of servitude and reintegrate them in the economic life.

The Employers' members, stating that this was a serious case discussed over a long period of time, praised the very open and forthright position of the Government. However, it was very difficult to engage in dialogue of this kind on the basis of oral information, and that was why they hoped that the Government would not fail to supply its reports on time in the future. But this case was not about reporting: rather, it involved a complicated, intractable problem on which there was little measurable progress. They emphasized that this case concerned forced labour and the Government representative's reference to the subject of child labour in general was a different issue. A new focus needed to be brought to problems of this kind and the Employers thought that a special paragraph might well be the kind of emphasis needed to spur the Government on to renew its efforts to solve this problem more expeditiously.

The Workers' members emphasized that it has not been suggested that the Government's report was deliberately delayed. Noting that the Government had supplied a report on 2 June, which was already an improvement, they pointed out, however, that this Committee never before had an up-to-date report which enabled it to have an effective discussion. They were not accusing India of failing to solve the problem of child labour overnight. The Workers' members wanted to discern some sort of will to act, some feeling that the problem was treated as a matter of priority above all priorities and that some time in the future this would bring about a positive result. Regretfully, the Workers' members, as well as the Employers' members, had not got that feeling. The Workers' members considered that a special paragraph should enable the Government representative to go back to his country to show the urgent concern of this Committee. They hoped that this sense of urgency would be conveyed in the conclusions to be adopted.

The Committee took note of the oral information furnished by the Government representative and of the developments that had taken place. It regretted that no report had been furnished in time by the Government but noted that the report as well as the replies to the comments of the Committee of Experts were received in the International Labour Office on 2 June 1994. It regretted that this late despatch made it impossible for the Committee of Experts, and consequently for the Conference Committee, to consider the most recent information supplied by the Government. In any event, the Committee noted that, notwithstanding the efforts made, much remained to be done to overcome the problems already discussed in the course of the many earlier sessions and highlighted by the Committee of Experts concerning, in particular, the identification, liberation and rehabilitation of persons in bonded labour, including children, as well as, in particular, the introduction of an efficient enforcement system. In this regard, the Committee remained very deeply concerned by the situation. The Committee firmly invited the Government to send its next report on time so that it could be examined by the Committee of Experts, as well as by the Conference Committee. Considering the conclusions it adopted last year and bearing in mind the gravity of the questions which had been discussed for several years now without any progress being recorded, the Committee reiterated its very deep concern. It urged the Government not to spare any efforts to institute the urgent and necessary measures for the elimination of debt bondage and to furnish without delay and without fail all the detailed information required by the Committee of Experts. The Committee decided to include its conclusions in a special paragraph of its report.

Thailand (ratification: 1969). The Government supplied the following information:

The Government refers to the 1994 observation of the Committee of Experts, in particular, the section entitled "Child sexual exploitation" in which 'non-governmental organizations' (NGOs) estimates range from 200,000-300,000 to 800,000 children in prostitution". The Government is aware of the origin of the said non-governmental organizations' estimates and has examined them carefully. It wishes to make the following observations:

According to the Special Rapporteur on the Sale of Children in his report to the Commission on Human Rights (document E/CN.4/1992/55 of 22 January 1992, paragraph 151): "there is a debate as to whether there are really 800,000 child prostitutes or whether this is a gross exaggeration. The available statistics are often out of date; for this reason, this report does not wish to delve into exact computations of statistics, precisely because they are incomplete". Given the fact that statistics in the area of child prostitution are incomplete and that the issue of child prostitution is universal and can be found in all countries, it is regrettable that the report of the Committee of Experts should thus publish statistics that are incomplete and that have yet to be proven. Meanwhile, the Thai Government is actively engaged in eradicating child sexual exploitation. Keeping this objective in mind, it has pursued its study in detail in order to determine with as much certitude as possible the statistics in this matter. According to the latest research conducted by the competent authorities in Thailand, an estimate of 20,000-30,000 children in prostitution would seem to correspond much more to the facts and reality.

In addition, a Government representative noted the precise, fair and objective observation of the situation in the Committee of Experts' report and also expressed appreciation to the Director-General for making the direct contacts mission possible. He considered that the extent to which labour standards are introduced, developed and enforced depended on the existence of democratic government and on the capacity of the national government to implement appropriate measures in practice. He pointed out that the direct contacts mission which took place in September 1993 coincided with the restoration of democracy after military rule and stressed the strong commitment made by the Prime Minister to do away with child labour. In the field of labour, new reforms had been adopted such as the provision of 90 days of maternity leave with pay; maximum overtime of 24 hours per week; a Bill had been submitted to Parliament to re-establish the right to organize and collective bargaining for state enterprise workers; and the Ministry of Labour and Social Welfare was established after some long delay. As to the specific points raised by the Committee of Experts, the Government representative admitted that he could not deny the existence of child labour and children working under conditions of exploitation in Thailand. Under the present labour law, children under 13 years of age are not allowed to work; children between 13 and 15 years of age are allowed to do work that is not harmful to their physical and mental health. In addition compulsory education has been extended by three years to cover up to grade nine. He stated that experience had revealed that 85 per cent of children continue their education and considered that such a trend would reduce the number of children in employment. The new Government has also amended the Criminal Code to increase penalties for those who commit serious offences to 20 years' imprisonment and life sentence in the case of the child's death. This amendment has been approved by Parliament in April 1994 and is expected to become law some time in July 1994. Second, regarding policy and measures to solve child labour, the Government representative pointed out that a high-level committee on child labour had been set up, chaired by the Minister of Labour and Social Welfare and consisting of the government departments concerned, NGOs and academics. The main task of this committee is to coordinate the work and to mobilize all concerned to prevent child labour and protect children in employment through a campaign to increase public awareness at all levels. In addition, several working groups had been established to work on such programmes as public relations campaigns and a "Centre for Community Watch" with the participation of NGOs and workers to keep a close eye on child labour. As to enforcement, the speaker noted that from September 1993 to the end of May 1994, a vigorous inspection had been made covering more than 7,000 establishments and that 44 employers had been prosecuted for violation of labour laws. Third, as to the progress of new labour laws, a draft Bill had been submitted to Parliament, which was expected to discuss it at the present session (May to August 1994). Main and new features of the Bill included the prohibition of employment of a child on holidays, reduction of working hours (six hours a day and 36 hours a week) and prohibition of sale of women. Fourth, the Government representative underlined the establishment of the Ministry of Labour and Social Welfare, which became operational in September 1993. He considered that the fact that the responsible agency had received a ministerial rank and also adequate staff and resources explained the many actions taken during this short period. The speaker expressed his Government's willingness to work with national and international agencies, particularly the ILO, to enhance the capacity of the Ministry to implement its programme. He promised that further detailed information on progress would be provided in the next report to the Committee of Experts. He concluded by reiterating that child labour had become a high priority issue for his Government, that there existed a high level of awareness of child labour in the society and that several policies and measures had been translated into action.

The Workers' members, after recalling the previous discussions on the case in the Conference Committee including a special paragraph in 1991, expressed disappointment at the non-receipt of the report of the Government, although information in the report came from the direct contacts mission which involved the Government. They considered that nothing was more distressing and horrifying for the Committee than to see the indications in the Committee of Experts' report, for instance, that children were bought and sold, that child-catchers were operating in the country. They pointed out that, although there were laws and although the Government's indication of the increased penalties was welcomed, there was little or no enforcement. They stressed that in spite of high-sounding policy statements in 1988 and 1992, the problem persisted. They noted that the direct contacts mission obtained a considerable amount of information from NGOs like the Women Lawyers' Association, while the Government did not seem to be aware of such information. They noted the Committee of Experts' reference to the National Youth Bureau's research material and quoted it for the purpose of record: "Most of the children lacked the opportunity to go home for a visit, or even to get in touch with their family; some of the children to whom advance payment had been made were not allowed to go outside the workplace ... Many children staying with the employer were found to be confined, scolded and physically and psychologically assaulted." They further quoted the "evidence given in particular by one rescued boy; he had been kidnapped at the railway station, was forced with other children to work extremely long hours, was beaten and not allowed to go out or look through the window. The factory in question, like many illegal factories, was composed of two adjoining sweat shops with all their windows sealed and the only corridor barricaded" and pointed out that this sounded like a nineteenth-century story by Charles Dickens. In view of such situations, the Workers' members were unimpressed with the argument by some Government members, particularly from Asian countries, during the general discussion that the social clause would discriminate against them and that it would be unfair to prevent the competition that they are able to achieve at the moment. The Workers' members referred to the paragraphs in the Committee of Experts' general report regarding child prostitution which was promoted in the West as a tourist attraction. They also criticized the import of products made by child labour to the West, which causes loss of employment there. As to the law enforcement, they noted that the labour inspectorate was still understaffed and under-equipped, even after some small improvements, and pointed out that the reduction in labour inspectors was found also in Western countries. As regards prosecutions, they underlined the need for severe sentences to be imposed and to be publicized to serve as deterrents. They also hoped that the measures of community awareness-raising and mobilization would create an atmosphere in which such situations would be discouraged and would be reported to the police for action. As to the figures concerning child prostitution, as shown in the written information provided, the Workers' members noted the existence of some argument about the number, but considered even 20-30,000 was horrifying and refused the Government's excuse that the statistics on child prostitution were incomplete. The Workers' members considered that the statement made by the Government representative gave some modest signs of the Government's efforts and wished to give every positive encouragement to the Government to take serious measures. They suggested recording their deep concern and that the case should be examined again next year after the examination by the Committee of Experts of the promised report of the Government.

The Employers' members welcomed the information supplied by the Government. They focused their comments on some points that they considered particularly important and tried to visualize the problem. The problem concerned the situations where children work instead of going to school, are prevented from seeing their family, are beaten and confined and even sexually exploited, which no words could really describe. The written information to which the Workers' members referred mentioned the figures according to the most recent survey in Thailand, of 20,000 to 30,000 children in prostitution, which was already unacceptable, without reaching 800,000 mentioned in the report of the Committee of Experts as in estimates by NGOs. According to the Employers' members, the key factor in eliminating these kinds of child abuse consisted of improving the inspectorate and the effectiveness of the enforcement machinery. They considered that the information of the Government was not sufficiently clear concerning the resources allocated to inspection activities and to an improvement in enforcement. There was also the severe problem of lack of police enforcement and police corruption that must be remedied. They also referred to the information in the report of the direct contacts mission, to the effect that only five prosecutions took place, which was explained by the fact that the matters were often regulated by negotiations. The Employers' members wondered why there were not more prosecutions, because it was inconceivable that negotiated settlements could make the child whole. It was striking that the Government was being too lenient in settling these cases. They also noted the description provided in the Committee of Experts' report of certain procedures in the Ministry of the Interior whereby criminal prosecutions would take place. In view of the fact that government bureaucracies could be quite complicated, the Employers' members had the impression that a very limited means existed to remedy the rights of the child that had been harmed in the circumstances. They were encouraged by the Government representative's statement but also were concerned about this case especially because, even with the best intentions, the Government still appeared too cautious in its approach to the problem. The tangible actions were urgently needed so that the Committee could note in the near future the end of the exploitation of children in Thailand.

A Government member of the United States of America noted the extremely serious and long-standing situation in Thailand involving the forced labour and exploitation of children. Although she appreciated that progress had been made, and referred in particular to the positive effect of the 1993 ILO direct contacts mission to Thailand, she strongly emphasized that these efforts must not only continue but also be markedly increased. Existing laws must be enforced, and particular efforts must be made to reach those hidden children who had been kidnapped or tricked into illegal abuse and exploitation. These children deserved to have a childhood, a family, an education and a future. She urged that the Government of Thailand take all necessary measures, particularly with the assistance of the ILO and its International Programme for the Elimination of Child Labour, to address this very grave problem on an urgent basis.

The Workers' member of Japan said that Thailand, although not alone in its child prostitution problem, could be included among those countries with the greatest difficulties in this area. He quoted the observation of the Committee of Experts which referred to the large pockets of poverty and profound disparities between rich and poor in a context of a tremendous national growth rate, and the need for effective policies and measures to enhance social justice and equity so that poor families could be assisted and children protected. In his view, this social aspect had been ignored while Thailand strived for economic growth. The international community, particularly those countries with large financial investments in Thailand, should divert some of these funds to social development. There should be sanctions against travel agencies that organized tours to take advantage of child prostitution. In particular, he stressed that the full cooperation of the social partners was necessary. If trade unions in that country were given full rights, they could make an important contribution, as human rights violations tended to exist whenever trade union rights were not guaranteed. He concluded by urging that the ILO mobilize its available resources, as it had done through the 1993 direct contacts mission, and provide other assistance such as the translation of ILO documents on child labour into local languages.

The Workers' member of Greece stated that in reading the nine pages of the report of the Committee of Experts on child labour in Thailand, he felt a chill down his spine because of the extent of the problem, which was a true shame for humanity. This situation also existed in other countries. He asked the Government representative to indicate whether the Government wished to introduce mandatory schooling beyond the minimum 13 years old currently provided for in legislation; and whether in the face of the tens of thousands of cases of child exploitation there had been other prosecutions between 1993 and today in addition to the five which had been referred to, and to give examples of the sentences. He noted that they were making efforts to create community awareness, in particular through radio and television broadcasts; however he asked whether this optimistic note in the report of the Committee of Experts had had concrete results.

The Workers' member of Pakistan stated that children in any part of the world represented the future for prosperity and their proper upbringing would lead to a better quality of life. He noted that during the 1992 ILO Asia Regional Conference, the Government had said that it would promote education and eliminate child labour. He asked when the legislation contemplated by the Government would come into force and what measures would be taken to enforce it. In particular he considered that it was deplorable that criminal interests would use children, including those from neighbouring countries, for child prostitution. In view of the widening gap between rich and poor, and the role of education in reducing poverty, he asked whether the Government had the political will to tackle problems relating to education and enforcement of prohibitions of forced labour.

The Workers' member of Senegal stated that child labour in countries like Thailand was low cost labour which resulted in goods for export being produced cheaply. Such goods were produced in a manner which contravened international Conventions and denoted a lack of respect for human dignity: they thus constituted unfair competition for products made, for example, in Africa, in working conditions which respected international labour Conventions. It was hypocritical for financial institutions and investors from rich countries to denounce countries like Thailand when they, themselves, invested in poor countries only if the social legislation allowed for precarious employment, a reduced level of social protection and a reduced level of buying power.

The Workers' member of the Republic of Korea stated that child labour was a direct result of poverty, and that empirical evidence had shown that it could be eliminated through economic development, but that with the decline of communism and the increased emphasis of the role of the market place over the role of the State, there was a tendency to neglect social protection. In these circumstances the ILO had a particularly important role to play as the international organization of social conscience, and he urged the ILO to conduct a strong and consistent campaign against child labour. With regard to the reference in the observation to the 112 children that had been rescued through a rehabilitation programme, he asked what had been done for the many thousands of other children involved in child prostitution. He considered that preventive measures were the most appropriate to address this problem, such as providing information and making a strong commitment to the education of children. As a means of protecting children by giving them more extensive education, he recommended that the duration of compulsory education be increased from six to nine years.

The Workers' member of Venezuela indicated that the problem of child labour not only took place in Thailand but also was a global problem. The cause of this problem was the abandonment of children, orphanhood, serious poverty, inflation, unemployment and other factors. It was necessary to legislate correctly and to develop effective policy and in this respect the ILO had a fundamental role to accomplish. The speaker related his broad experience in Venezuela concerning the complex and difficult problems arising from child labour including damaged youth, increased criminality, and the direction which should be followed to find realistic and effective solutions.

The Workers' member of the United States of America was appalled and disgusted by the problem of child prostitution in Thailand, and said that the entire Committee was shocked by the heinous conduct of those taking advantage of these children. In his view improvements in legislation were not sufficient. He stressed that what was needed was improved methods for the prosecution of offenders, and asked the Government how it intended to prosecute them, and what concrete measures it intended to introduce in order to eliminate child prostitution.

The Government representative said that he had listened carefully to the statements of members of the Committee, and fully understood their feelings. He himself was appalled and disturbed by the situation, and said that the majority of his compatriots were also unhappy about the situation, in particular intellectuals, trade unionists and progressive employers, of whom some had been attempting for many years to stop child prostitution. While child labour has multiple causes, the Thai situation was aggravated by two main factors, namely: the operation of the market economy and the short existence of a democratic system. Under such conditions, social and labour policies received low priority. Things had been improving since 1992 since a democratic government had taken the helm and announced a strong commitment to abolish child labour. With the recent establishment of the Ministry of Labour and Social Welfare, resources for social problems were being increased considerably. He considered that child labour should be combated not only by improving the legal framework, but also by raising the level of awareness of the community to the problems arising from child labour, and by gaining support from the community and from legislators. He appreciated the encouragement of some members and would convey their good wishes and suggestions to his Government.

The Workers' members did not doubt the personal integrity and sincerity of the Government representative. However, they asked him to convey to his Government the seriousness of the discussions on child labour and child prostitution held by the Committee, and stressed that they would not be satisfied until all child labour in Thailand was eliminated. They expressed the hope that next year there would be tangible signs of progress and that the Government would provide its report on this Convention so that there would be full information and a common approach to study, as well as the possibility for a full discussion. Finally, they emphasized that there should be cooperation among the social partners to provide help and advice and to constitute part of the process of community awareness.

The Employers' members added to the foregoing statements by the Workers' members by emphasizing the need for the Government to commit itself to making the elimination of child labour a first priority, as the problems described in the observation should be eliminated as soon as possible. They also pointed out that the Government representative had not really dealt with the issue of effective enforcement and compliance, as this was an essential part of the solution to the problem.

The Government member of Saudi Arabia stated that as child labour was a global phenomenon the ILO should fight against it and allocate a significant amount of its budget and activities for this struggle.

The Committee took note of the observations of the Committee of Experts and the written information and oral explanations provided by the Government representative and the discussion which took place in the Committee. The Committee noted with interest that a direct contacts mission made it possible to collect useful information during its visit to Thailand from 4 to 11 September 1993. However, the Committee regretted the fact that no report was provided by the Government, particularly since the situation had existed for many years. Despite the actions decided on at the political level in particular to give a follow up to the direct contacts mission, the Committee remained deeply concerned by the situation and by the fact that the legislative and practical measures already adopted by the Government that should protect children remained ineffective as far as their implementation was concerned, particularly with regard to sanctions imposed on those responsible for the abuse or measures concerning reintegration or rehabilitation. The Committee noted with interest the commitment expressed by the Government representative and urged the Government to take as a priority all necessary steps, if necessary with the support of the International Labour Office, to remedy or eliminate the serious situation with regard to child labour in their country and to provide the ILO with all necessary information to allow the supervisory machinery with effect from next year to note a real improvement in order to bring into full conformity with the law and practice in the country all the provisions in the Convention.

The representative of the Secretary-General indicated that the Government of Thailand had not sent the report that was due concerning this Convention and that one would be requested in the upcoming weeks. The Committee of Experts would deal with the case in its February 1995 Session and the present Committee would examine it next year. On the other hand, in response to the Government representative of Saudi Arabia, he stated that a considerable part of the ILO budget was dedicated to the question of child labour and that in addition, thanks to the generosity of Germany, the Office was carrying out a very important technical assistance programme for all those governments that requested it, in order to promote the elimination of child labour.

Convention No. 35: Old-Age Insurance (Industry, etc.), 1933

Peru (ratification: 1945). The Government has communicated the following information:

1. Article 4 of the Convention (Guarantee of an old-age pension once the capital is exhausted). In the system of national pensions, of which the Law No. 19990 contains the regulations, the right of each individual to an old-age pension is guaranteed. This conforms to Article 4 of the Convention, and the right only disappears at the individual's death. In the private system of pensions, the privilege of an old-age pension is guaranteed to those affiliated to this regime according to four modalities defined by the law: programmed retirement, individual annuity, family life annuity and temporal annuity with deferred life annuity. When the person reaches retirement age – 65 years – the administration of the Pension Fund (AFP) must inform the person and furnish him with the necessary explanations as to the modalities of payment of the private system of pensions and on the conditions to satisfy to receive the retirement pension in the delay foreseen. Section 42 of Law No. 25897 foresees in the possible modalities of pension payment the pension called programmed pension. In this option the affiliated person conserves the accumulated funds in his individual capitalization account and makes monthly withdrawals which are charged to the account until the Fund is exhausted. Resolution No. 141-93-EF/SAFR (subtitle I of title III) specifies that the formula of programmed retirement has, among other characteristics, revocability. The affiliated person has the possibility to convert the pension formula to individual or family life annuity or temporal annuity with deferred life annuity which are irrevocable. In this regard the freedom of action of the individual is of particular importance, and this is generally applied in the system because it is the affiliated person himself who, according to his interests and wishes, chooses the modalities of payment that are most convenient for him.

2. Article 9, paragraph 1, of the Convention (Financial contribution of employers to the formation of resources of the insurance). Section 6 of Law No. 19990, which concerns the national system of pensions, states that the sources of financing are contributions of the employer and the insured. Each should contribute 3 per cent of the remuneration of the insured. In the private system of pensions, the financial participation of employers is through an automatic increase of 13.54 per cent so that the worker can affiliate with the system, and this amount corresponds to his affiliation in the private system. This formula constitutes an indirect financing of the employer signifying that the employer takes charge of the cost of affiliation of the worker. Concerning workers for whom this increase does not occur, it is important to note that it is unnecessary to introduce a contribution on the employer as the total cost of labour to be supported by the employer is the same, whether or not the contribution is paid by him. The employer is concerned with total costs which include fiscal charges and fees on the employer for the worker. For the worker, on the other hand, what matters is net take-home pay. Initiating a regime of contributions from the employer will result in a reduction in take-home pay for the worker in proportion to the fee paid by the employer. In the opposite case, this approach results in a tax on work, which constitutes a reduction in a demand for labour. When one initiates a contribution solely from the worker, the employer assumes a greater responsibility in the payment of the fee, since this concerns the worker. When it is the worker who pays, he has full latitude in the choice of the AFP Fund with which to affiliate depending on whether he wishes a low or high contribution. Article 9, paragraph 3, of the Convention states that contributions from employers may be dispensed with under laws of national insurance not restricted in scope to employed persons. In this regard, it is important to mention that the private pension system is not limited only to salaried employees, but it is also open to all persons whether employed or not. In consequence, there is no contradiction of this provision to the Convention concerning the contribution of employers to the resources of the insurance within the two systems of insurance existing in our country.

3. Article 9, paragraph 4, of the Convention (Financial participation of the public sector in the formation of resources or in benefits of the insurance). The national system of pensions foresees a mechanism by which the public sector participates in the constitution of resources of the insured by a social contribution of the State. This is foreseen in paragraph (b) of section 35 of Law No. 24786. The granting of a general increase in pensions conforming to section 9 of Law No. 19990 is permissible when a Ministerial Resolution decides on a readjustment of pensions. In the private system of pensions, the participation of the public sector in financing equally is foreseen within section 9 of Law No. 25897. This section foresees the issuing of recognition coupons by the Peruvian Institute of Social Security (IPSS) for an amount corresponding to the annuity of the worker, in function of the monthly contribution of this organization at the date at which Law No. 06-12-1992 entered in force. Thus, the State contributes to the mass of resources which each individual conserves and capitalizes in his insurance account. These resources constitute the funds for the financing of pensions once payments begin. A regulatory standard recently was adopted to define the conditions in which the recognition coupons are issued. This was the last remaining element left concerning state financing.

4. Article 10, paragraph 1, of the Convention (Management of the insurance). The national system of pensions permits each person, every worker and all groups of workers which adhere to an AFP Fund the possibility to become a manager of the Fund, and any remuneration resulting from this activity reverts to the manager. In this view, the Law on Collective Work Relations, which authorizes the formation of representative organizations for categories of workers, foresees the possibility for trade union organizations to have a union heritage, identical to that which is used for the constitution of an AFP Fund, if the organization so decides. In this way, categories of organizations have the freedom to form an AFP Fund, and any supplementary remuneration for administration of the Fund is to the profit of their members. Furthermore, AFP Funds are controlled by the State through the intermediary of the Control Commission of Private Pension Funds (SAFP). According to sections 53 and 54 of Law No. 25897, it is the duty of SAFP to monitor and control AFP Funds to guard against all inherent risks in independent private management of a private limited company. In consequence, AFP Funds necessarily have a special place in legal provisions, and they are controlled by SAFP, to respect the legal provisions concerning administrative directives.

5. Article 10, paragraph 4, of the Convention (Participation of the insured in the management of the insurance). The national system of pensions foresees the participation of the insured in the administration of the Peruvian Institute of Social Security (IPSS) through the board of directors and the board of guardianship, conforming to what is foreseen in Chapter III of the General Law respecting IPSS. In the system of private pensions, the participation of workers comes through freedom of choice, which permits affiliation to a specific AFP Fund. The insured decides freely to either conserve or transfer his funds to an AFP Fund which has the most appropriate management from his point of view and which best represents him. Finally, it is important to mention that the private system of pensions in Peru is only at the beginning of identifying the possibilities that can be offered. It should be noted that the possibility for workers to constitute their own AFP Fund, through their specialized organizations, is open to them. They might also participate by obtaining something akin to stocks in an AFP Fund which are recognized as valuable by the AFP Fund.

In addition, the a Government representative reiterated the written information furnished to the Committee.

The Employers' members stated that this was the first time that this case has been discussed by the Committee. This question is familiar to them since the cases of other countries have been taken up in the last few years and they indicated that success in a new system of pensions tended to be rapidly imitated. The Committee of Experts expressed certain doubts as to the conformity of the private system of pensions with the Convention. The Employers' members felt that the complete information which has been furnished must be first examined by the Committee of Experts. The Committee of Experts is requested to indicate if they are satisfied or if doubts exist. The question therefore is still open and they must return to it. They next dealt with two points that they judged fundamental. The first was that the Convention was adopted in 1933, that is to say 60 years ago, and that only 11 countries have ratified it. At the time of its adoption, we thought the State was all powerful and it was inconceivable to imagine social protection without its control. We had no trust and no experience in market solutions and market economies; it was unimaginable that a successful system of private social security could be created. The Employers' members felt that the current situation was completely different. This explained the divergence between what was foreseen in the Convention and a private pension system. They stressed that it was important to respect certain provisions of the Convention which did not deal with human rights. The question we needed to answer was whether it was useful to criticize a system which might not be bad. They felt that it was useful to wait for the opinion of the Committee of Experts to see whether they should re-examine this case.

The Workers' members noted, in reading the report of the Committee of Experts, that the Government had sent a detailed report on the new private system of pensions in Peru and they took note of the supplementary information concerning this system presented by the Government. They pointed out, like the Employers' members, that the question of private systems' pensions has already been discussed for other countries, such as Chile. The new Peruvian system, which was analogous to the others, led to concern as to the guarantees offered with respect to its compatibility with Convention No. 35 (and also with the Social Security (Minimum Standards) Convention, 1952 (No. 102)). They had already expressed their doubts as to the sustainability of the system, the absence of equality between generations concerning the level of benefits guaranteed, returns on investments by the funds and as to the role of workers' organizations in the management of the system. The information furnished in response to the questions of the Committee of Experts on the subject of the application of Article 4 of the Convention preoccupied them, given that the insured may withdraw amounts until the exhaustion of the accumulated capital in his account. On the other hand, even if the worker may choose freely between the national system and the private system, he cannot be re-integrated into the national sytem once he has opted for the private system. He must eventually suffer the negative consequences of this choice to the detriment of his rights. The system leaves unanswered questions concerning the financial contribution of employers. Being able to choose between a high or low contribution leads to obvious risks notably pressure on the part of the employer. No precision is given concerning the financial participation of public administrations. Dispositions concerning the participation of the insured person in the management of the fund must be studied very closely. Nothing seems to be foreseen as concerns financial guarantees of the State, notably for the fund Electrolima. In consequence, the requirements of this new system do not appear to bring guarantees foreseen by the Convention, and it requires a profound examination of the points specified.

The Workers' member from Spain recalled that what distinguishes the members of the Committee of Standards is the social preoccupation which characterizes their view. In his opinion, the public system of social security, to which workers and employers contribute, administered by a non-profit organization, is one of the best systems developed. He was concerned that Peru had replaced this system by a completely different one and also by the fact that only 11 countries had ratified the Convention. He requested the Conference Committee to ask the Government to strictly apply the dispositions of the Convention.

The Workers' member of Peru stated that the response of the Government to the observations made by the Committee of Experts on the application of the provisions of this Convention was unsatisfactory for Peruvian workers. With reference to Article 4 (guarantee of an old-age pension once the capital was exhausted), she indicated that the concern of the Workers was that the "programmed retirement" method obligated the future pensioner to calculate the number of years he could live after 65 years of age, which was the required age for retirement in the SPP; if the worker calculated that he would live ten more years, until 75 years of age, his accumulated funds in an individual account were divided among the ten years in order to determine his pension, but if he surpassed 75 years of age, he had no right to a pension because he would have exhausted the capital and the law did not guarantee, in this case, a pension of any kind. As for Article 9, paragraph 1 (financial participation of employers), she stated that the private pensions system was financed only by the workers since, although the Government argued that the increase of 13.54 per cent of the remuneration which the worker received when retiring from the public system and joining the private system was equivalent to an indirect form of financing by the employer, this amount, which was given only one time, disappeared with the passing of the years in view of inflation. Moreover, this contribution did not occur in the case of new workers. She also specified that non-fulfilment by employers with regard to the contribution to the SPP, was the result of an agreement with the Government to eliminate "anti-technical" taxes which created additional costs for enterprises, including the contribution to social security. With regard to Article 9, paragraph 4 (financial participation of the public authorities), she explained that the Government had stopped participating and restricted itself to demanding that the SPP issue recognition coupons to the workers which entered the SPP, coupons which did not count on financial support. She also indicated that the Government had taken responsibility for a system of public pensions which would be administered by the State; however, the law neither guaranteed these funds nor the pensions of workers who were members of the SPP in the event of bankruptcy. She then referred to Article 10, paragraph 1 (administration of the insurance), and emphasized the profitable nature of the SPP and the fact that it had among its stock holders Peruvian enterprises which exerted pressure on its workers to join the SPP, making as a condition for renewal of their contracts membership of the SPP. Finally, she referred to Article 10, paragraph 4 (participation of insured persons), and to the response of the Government to the effect that in the SPP the participation of workers was found "in the choice granted by the system to join a determined AFP". In her view, this was like referring to the participation of savings depositors in a bank, which was to say that there was none, since no bank consulted with its depositors about how their savings should be invested. The speaker concluded by stating that the Government in its reply tried to justify the unjustifiable and had taken no measures to bring the law into conformity with the Convention, and requested that this case be included in a Special Paragraph of the report.

The Workers' member of Colombia expressed his preoccupation with the fact that in Latin America only four countries had ratified this Convention, and indicated that the situation in Colombia was very similar to that of Peru described by the previous speaker. He considered it of the utmost importance that the ILO continued to give special attention to this Convention. The situation in Peru was becoming a common denominator for the majority of the Latin American countries where social security systems were used to enrich only a few while leaving unprotected the overwhelming majority of the population. In Colombia, the privatization of the pension system would lead to the accumulation of 17,000 million dollars, the equivalent of the amount of the country's external debt. He supported the previous speaker in that the ILO should pay particular attention to this serious problem and regretted that Colombia had not ratified this Convention.

The Government representative stated that he had noted with great attention all the interventions which would be communicated to the Ministry of Labour so that it could shortly provide the information on the application of this Convention.

The Committee took note of the written and oral information provided by the Government representative and of the discussion which took place. It noted that, according to the Committee of Experts, the law and practice did not appear to be in conformity with the requirements of the Convention in all respects. The Committee urged the Government to provide complete and detailed information requested by the Committee of Experts with a view to being able to assess the development of the situation in the near future.

Convention No. 87: Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise, 1948

Cameroon (ratification: 1960). A Government representative of Cameroon considered the report of the Committee of Experts to be constructive. With regard to Convention No. 87, she stated that Act No. 68/LF/19 dated 18 November 1968 making the legal existence of a trade union of public servants subject to the prior authorization of the Minister of Territorial Administration was to be repealed, to conform to Article 2 of the Convention. Draft legislation had been sent to the Prime Minister for submission to the National Assembly. While awaiting the promulgation of this Act, and in order to show the good faith of the authorities, she cited the decision of 11 May 1994 which recognized the national trade union of officials of the civil and financial services. She referred to a letter of the Executive Secretary-General of this trade union which expressed its appreciation of this recognition. In addition, teachers, who formed a trade union that was not presently recognized, could join this trade union because they were officials of the civil service. With regard to teachers engaged on a contractual basis, they could join the national trade union for contractual workers and state agents pursuant to the Labour Code. She indicated that Cameroon was not opposed to the creation of trade unions, as the matter of the unrecognized trade union concerned simply a question of legality, and that meanwhile the Government noted the observations of the Committee of Experts regarding the Act of 1968. With reference to section 6(2) of the Labour Code making the legal existence of a trade union subject to registration, she stated that, as her Government had already reiterated, it was a matter of a simple formality that existed for all civil acts such as the creation of commercial companies requiring a registration number at the commerce registry and thus granting them a legal status. With regard to trade unions, this formality allowed them to deal with third parties, and this did not constitute a contravention of the Convention. She stated that her Government was open to the observations and advice of this Committee in order to improve, even if no impediments existed, the creation of trade unions. Concerning section 19 of Decree No. 69/DF/7 of 6 January 1969 providing that associations or professional unions could not belong to a foreign professional organization without prior authorization from the Minister responsible for "control of public freedom", she noted that this Decree was a text implementing the Act of 1968. Once the new act was proclaimed the implementing Decree of the old law would be brought into compliance with the requirements of Convention No. 87. In the meantime, she counted upon the understanding of the Committee of Experts.

With reference to Conventions Nos. 87 and 98, she referred to section 6 of the Labour Code providing for the legal existence of professional trade unions, section 3, proclaiming freedom of association, and section 4, granting to employers and workers the right to join organizations and trade unions of their choosing. Section 6(2) forbade all discriminatory acts against workers in employment. This section also provided under paragraph (b) that any practice that would terminate the employment of, or cause any prejudice to, persons because of their affiliation or non-affiliation to a trade union or their participation in trade union activities was prohibited. She indicated that this paragraph was not contrary to the provision of Articles 3 and 4 of the Convention because it guaranteed the legality of the formation of trade unions so that they could act as such legally. Section 6(3) provided that any act that was contrary to the provisions of this section was void. Finally, she stated that Cameroon was a law-abiding State and that it was prepared to submit to the Commission any additional information.

The Workers' members referred to the questions dealt with by the Committee of Experts and noted that the Government was prepared to repeal legislation that did not conform to the Conventions and that the actual practice would be changed to achieve the same conformity. They did hesitate in wholly accepting the explanation of the Government to the effect that the requirement that trade unions must be registered was merely an administrative formality, but concluded by thanking the Government representative for her goodwill and assurances. They nevertheless recalled the gravity of certain points raised by the Committee of Experts, and said that a report on what actually was occurring would need to be submitted for examination.

The Employers' members noted that the points raised in the report of the Committee of Experts had been made for a number of years, although one matter had been resolved last year and was cited as a case of progress. The Government had defended itself last year in the same manner as it did this year, by indicating that although there were no contradictions between the legal situation and the Convention, legislative amendments would be introduced if this were insisted upon by the Committee. With regard to the requirement that trade unions be registered, this was clearly not a formality in view of the rejection of the application by a teachers' trade union for such registration. They asked the Government to put into practice what had been promised in the Committee and to modify the legislation to bring it into compliance with the Convention.

The Workers' member of Senegal stated that the Government had promised every year that it would respect Conventions Nos. 87 and 98, but they were continuing to violate trade union rights in Cameroon, in particular by not recognizing trade union organizations and their right to register. Likewise the Government had recently violated freedom of association since the Ministry of Labour supported the dismissal of the Secretary-General of the Cameroon Confederation of Workers' Trade Unions (CWTU), through a puppet disputes committee controlled by the authorities. This dismissal was due to the trade union activities of the Secretary-General of the CWTU. He requested that the ILO take the necessary measures so that the Secretary-General could resume his duties. Moreover, wages had fallen because of the devaluation of the CFA franc.

The Workers' member of the Netherlands stated that the assurances made by the Government representative were not convincing, as the action of the Government seemed to contradict the statements made before the Committee. As an example, he quoted a provision from a piece of draft legislation of Cameroon which provided that trade unions established for a cause or purpose contrary to the Constitution, the law, or accepted standards of behaviour, or those trade unions designed to impair the security, territorial integrity, national unity, national integration, or the Republican form of the State would be declared null and void. He asked that both the Workers' and Employers' members examine the case more cautiously.

The Workers' member of New Zealand supported the statement of the Workers' member of Senegal, as the situation in Cameroon clearly amounted to a serious contravention of the Conventions. The Committee of Experts' report had highlighted the practices that are incompatible with the requirements of Conventions Nos. 87 and 98. Any denial of freedom of association was unacceptable, and especially damaging with regard to teachers because their working conditions constituted the same environment where children and young people learn. Moreover, teachers' unions acted as professional organizations to assist their members to develop high professional standards. Denial of access to such an organization, particularly when higher education was involved, usually reflected a desire to control what was taught and how it was taught, which amounted to a denial of academic freedom. Such restrictions were compounded by a restriction of the right of trade unions or professional organizations to join foreign professional organizations, thus denying Cameroon the benefit of exchanges of ideas and knowledge from outside the country. She also referred to infringements of the freedom of association of teachers in Cameroon involving the dismissal, suspension, and forced transfer of teachers and public servants for participating in a strike. While accepting that the Committee acknowledged positive developments, she asked that the Government be requested to grant teachers in higher education the right to form unions of their own choosing and the right to bargain collectively. She also asked that an undertaking be obtained from the Government that it not frustrate the activities of the Cameroon Confederation of Workers' Trade Unions.

The Workers' member of Togo emphasized that the Committee of Experts and the previous speakers had pointed out serious and repeated violations of trade union rights in the legislation and in practice. These violations were also occurring in other African countries whenever trade union organizations adopted an independent approach. With regard to the assurance of the Government representative that the trade union register was a formality, the speaker indicated that this "formality" could indefinitely delay the formation of trade unions, preventing them from developing their activities. On the other hand, section 3 of the draft Act referred to by the Government representative contained worrisome concepts that could prevent the formation of trade unions or impede their activities, as now occurred in respect of professional trade unions. He also joined in the previous statement on the dismissal of the Secretary-General of the Cameroon Confederation of Workers' Trade Unions. Finally, he stressed that there was a practice of interference in collective bargaining and he considered that the Committee should demand that the Government comply with Conventions Nos. 87 and 98.

The Government representative stated that she maintained her previous statement and that she hoped that an amalgamation of matters would be avoided with regard to such an important discussion; in this sense, she indicated that the Workers' member of Senegal recognized that his comments were not to the point. With regard to the Cameroon Confederation of Workers' Trade Unions, she indicated that her country had ratified Conventions Nos. 87 and 98 and that it was its duty to respect these Conventions. She believed that the creation of a trade union of officials of the civil and financial services could reassure the Committee, as in her opinion this constituted progress. Teachers on contract and teachers who were public servants worked under different rules. The latter could belong to the trade union referred to above, while the teachers on contract could belong to the national trade union for contractual workers and agents of the State. She emphasized that there would be a law permitting those who wished to create a specific trade union to do so and that she would inform her Government of the observations that had been made in this Committee.

The Workers' members recognized that they might have been overly willing to accept the assurances given by the Government representative that the legislation in contravention of the Conventions would be repealed and the contravening practices discontinued. They then reiterated their concern regarding the registration requirement, and the need for further examination by the Committee of Experts, and hoped that the promises made by the Government representative would be kept.

The Committee took note of the statement made by the Government representative and the discussion which followed. The Committee reminded the Government of the need to amend its legislation and practice as soon as possible in order to ensure the application of these Conventions, in particular to guarantee that public servants have the right to set up trade union organizations and to join them to defend their economic, social and professional interests. It took note of the preoccupation of the Committee of Experts in light of the refusal of the Government to give legal status to a trade union of teachers in higher education, and expressed the firm hope that the forthcoming reports from the Government would show what effective measures had actually been taken in order to remove obstacles to freedom of association and to guarantee for all workers, including public servants and teachers in higher education, the right to join the trade union of their choice without interference by the public authorities.

Germany (ratification: 1957). A Government representative explained (in relation to paragraph 3 of the observation of the Committee of Experts) that in the German public service there were three categories of employees: manual workers, state employees and public servants. Manual workers and state employees, just like their colleagues in the private sector were employed on the basis of a contract which could be modified during its duration. Their terms of employment were laid down in collective bargaining agreements, they paid contributions to social security and they had the right to strike. The contractual status of public servants, on the other hand, was established on their appointment. Instead of signing a contract, they swore an oath of loyalty to their employer. Public servants could be dismissed only if they had been responsible for very serious cases of misconduct. It was the legislator who laid down their terms of employment including their salaries. They did not pay social security contributions. They were not allowed to exercise the right to strike. The reasons were many. First, the Constitution prohibited the situation whereby a public servant could refuse to perform his duties for his employer, which had been confirmed by the Federal Constitutional Court. Another reason was that, according to jurisprudence of the Federal Labour Court which had been confirmed by the Federal Constitutional Court, labour conflicts in Germany could only be conducted in connection with subjects which were covered by collective bargaining agreements. However, as already mentioned, the terms of employment of public servants were fixed by the legislator. Therefore, a strike by public servants would not be directed against the employer but against Parliament. Finally, the prohibition of strikes by public servants was consistent with the objective of continuing to provide some services for citizens even if there were labour conflicts. The speaker wondered whether if, at the time when Germany had envisaged the ratification of Convention No. 87, there had been sufficient elements to indicate that a right to strike would be extended to public servants at a later stage. He recalled that under the Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (article 8, paragraph 2), legal restrictions on the right to strike for civil servants had been admitted. At the time of ratifying the European Social Charter, the Government had entered a reservation indicating that civil servants (Beamte) were excluded from the application of point 4 of Article 6 (Part II), a procedure that was not permitted for ILO Conventions. The absence of any mention of the right to strike in the text of Convention No. 87 could either be explained by the fact that the authors of the Convention felt that it was not a component of freedom of association or that it was so evidently a part of freedom of association that it was not even worth expressing explicitly. However, if the latter case were true, then what had been said in the 1994 General Survey on Freedom of Association and Collective Bargaining (paragraph 48, footnote 4) was equally true. This paragraph quoted Report VII of the 30th (1947) Session of the International Labour Conference which contained amongst other things the following statement: "However, the recognition of the right of association of public servants in no way prejudges the question of the right of such officials to strike ...". Hence, this paragraph had to be interpreted in such a way that the recognition of the right to strike for public servants had to be left to the discretion of the States that had ratified the Convention. However, the Committee of Experts had adopted a different approach. They did not just say that the right to strike was a component of freedom of association. They affirmed this right in a very specific and detailed way with which he could not agree. The Committee of Experts had allowed for restrictions on the right to strike in the public service to be subject to one particular criterion based on the function of the public servant concerned. However, in Germany, what was decisive was not the function of the public servant but the status of the employee. If one had the status of a career public servant, the right to strike could not be exercised. All other employees, that was to say, state employees and manual workers could strike, regardless of whether they were carrying out essential services or not. In practical terms, the speaker indicated that 21 per cent of those who were employed on a full-time basis in the public service were public servants (Beamte) not including the armed forces and the police. However, there were frequent strikes in the public service in Germany; also in the railways and in the postal services, where 30 per cent and 56 per cent of employees respectively were public servants. This percentage was also very high in the educational sector; by contrast, it was very low (10 per cent) in the local authorities. In fact, the German postal service was a very clear example of how strikes could be carried out quite successfully, even if only a low proportion of the people concerned were entitled to strike. In recent years, there were strikes on two occasions in the postal services, where public servants who were not entitled to strike were employed in place of striking manual workers and state employees in order to mitigate the consequences of the strikes. Moreover, in the railways and the postal services, the problem of those public servants who did not have the right to strike would disappear in the future, since privatization measures were being introduced which would lead to a situation whereby no public servants would be employed in the future in those services. The speaker agreed with the Committee of Experts that restrictions on the right to strike should never be extrapolated to such an extent that strikes became a blunt or useless weapon. However, this was certainly not the case in Germany where another criterion was applied for the limitation of the right to strike in the public service. This criterion was different from the one adopted by the Committee of Experts, which should not, in the view of the speaker, be considered as the only generally admissible criterion. Finally, the speaker stressed that no employee of the State in Germany was obliged to become a public servant but the vast majority of those who had fulfilled the prerequisites asked to become career public servants, knowing that this implied the loss of their right to strike.

The Workers' members stated that this was a case of principle which had been the subject of comments by the Committee of Experts for several years. However, neither the situation nor the Government's attitude in this regard had changed. Of course the problem was complex and could not be resolved immediately. It concerned the prohibition of the right to strike for all public servants whatever their functions and the sectors to which they belonged. Without entering into the debate concerning the definition and the status of public servants, it was appropriate to recall, like the Committee of Experts, that it was necessary to limit the number of persons affected by restrictions on the right to strike in order to avoid excluding a large number of workers from this right, and notably workers employed in industrial or commercial state enterprises. In this respect, it was appropriate to draw the attention of the Employers' members to the fact that in Germany, public sector employers had prerogatives that private sector employers did not have. If the position of the German Government was to be applied generally, this could lead to discrimination especially in countries having a very large public sector. Finally, it was to be recalled that Convention No. 87 was a fundamental instrument and, consequently, concrete measures should be taken to bring legislation and practice into conformity with the obligations set out in Articles 3 and 10.

The Employers' members would have also liked to discuss the first two points in this case on access to the workplace for union representatives who were not employees of the enterprise and the issue of replacing strikers. With respect to the workplace access issue, they were concerned that the Committee of Experts had not given enough consideration to the rights of private property. On the striker replacement issue, the experts had established an absolute rule that was even stricter than that taken by the Committee on Freedom of Association and which did not take into account the characteristics of a complex system of labour relations. The Employer's members emphasized that this was the first time that the issue of the prohibition of strikes in the public sector had been considered in this Committee. They pointed out that Germany had ratified Convention No. 87 in 1957, two years before the Committee of Experts had observed that there was in fact a right to strike in the public sector under Convention No. 87. So when Germany ratified this Convention, it had no notice that the right to strike applied in its circumstances. They further noted that the experts' first observation on this matter had occurred 30 years after the Government of Germany had ratified Convention No. 87. This case, from the employers' perspective, illustrated the problem with the one-size-fits-all approach that the experts took for many issues. In the case of strikes by public employees, the Committee of Experts would have this Committee apply two unqualified rules: that the prohibition of strikes should be limited to public servants exercising authority in the name of the State and to services, the interruption of which would endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population. On the issue of strikes in essential services, the Employers' members considered that the experts' observation in this case was not consistent with what they had said in this year's General Survey, especially when considering their previously heretofore absolute rule. In this respect, the Employers' members referred to the sentence in paragraph 160 of the Survey, namely that "Account must be taken of the special circumstances existing in the various member States." The Employers' members thought that a more pragmatic, less detailed approach was called for when such a right to strike was implied through interpretation, rather than by express reference to the Convention. Germany had a special category of public employees (Beamte) that was unique in the world. While the Employers' members acknowledged that not all Beamte exercised authority in the name of the State, they swore an oath to represent the State by virtue of their special status under public law. Beamte were effectively given employment for life and an enriched pension benefit, among other considerations. These were highly sought-after jobs. In exchange for those benefits and responsibilities, that were not typical of other public employees around the world, they swore an oath of loyalty and could not strike. They had a special relationship of confidentiality and loyalty governed by public law. The Employers' members considered that, given the history of Germany and the reasons for creating the public service category of Beamte, the experts should, as they appeared to have done now in the case of strikes in essential services, reconsider their view relating to the prohibition of strikes by the Beamte and take account of the special circumstances existing with respect to the Beamte. The Employers' members concluded that the Government should be asked to consider and do what it realistically could do to comply with Convention No. 87 and that the Committee of Experts should be asked, as its Chairman stated in his summation, "to change what it can change".

The Workers' member of Japan stated that this was a very important case of principle, the implications of which could go far beyond Germany to many other countries, including his own. The observation made by the Committee of Experts in this case on the right to strike in public services was nothing new but exactly in line with the position it took in its 1983 and 1994 General Surveys. However, it was the very first time that it had been applied to an individual case in this Committee and therefore was very significant. He particularly welcomed the observation made by the experts asking the German Government to take the necessary steps to guarantee to public servants other than those exercising authority in the name of the State and to their organizations, the right to organize their activities and formulate their programmes of action to defend their economic, social and occupational interests, including by resorting to strike action, without any interference on the part of the public authorities.

The Workers' member of Germany indicated that more than 1.6 million public servants were, in addition to manual workers and state employees, mostly in ministries and administrations at the federal level. For example, in the railways and the postal services, there were more than 400,000 public servants employed. In the federal system, there were more than 900,000 public servants in the field of education and in other fields of employment in the states. He indicated that not all of these people would be entitled to exercise the right to strike. Although the working conditions for public servants were laid down in legislation and statutory regulations, in so far as their income was concerned, the results of wage agreements for those working in the public service were also applicable to public servants. In recent years, however, this was no longer the case. There had been actual interventions or attempts at intervention through the legislative process regarding working conditions. For example, the number of working hours would be increased without any corresponding increase in wages. For reasons of this kind, and not withstanding the ban on the right to strike, the indignation of the public servants had escalated into brief periods of strike action. Disciplinary measures had been taken against the strikers concerning financial claims, wage claims and claims concerning promotion. In recent years, both the Committee of Experts and the Committee on Freedom of Association had repeatedly called upon his Government to guarantee the right to strike to public servants, to the extent that they were not exercising sovereign functions. Despite these clear pronouncements by the ILO supervisory bodies, the Government had thus far taken no measures to carry out these prescriptions. Even in the case of the privatization of the railway and postal sectors, the federal Government had emphatically opposed any demands for a right to strike for persons employed in these sectors. This meant that public servants who were working for a private joint stock company and who were no longer supposed to be fulfilling any public duties were still denied the right to strike. There was no justification for withholding the right to strike in this case. Referring to the case law of the Federal Constitutional Court, the speaker indicated that neither the Constitution nor any other law contained any express provisions which prohibited strikes by public servants. He concluded by asserting that his Government should make it clear that it was prepared to undertake specific action in accordance with the prescriptions of the ILO supervisory bodies, particularly having regard to the human rights nature of Convention No. 87.

The Workers' member of Greece stated that this issue was of particular interest for European workers. The argument according to which it was necessary to privatize public services so that workers could have the right to strike was unacceptable. If a country, such as Germany, did not grant the right to strike to workers and did not strictly apply the provisions of Convention No. 87 – one of the fundamental Conventions, if not the most fundamental – what was going to happen? It would be impossible to ask other countries, whichever they may be, to respect the provisions of this Convention.

The Government representative of Germany, referring to the situation in the railway and postal sectors, acknowledged that, as long as public employees had the status of public servants, then no exception could be made for them, even in privatized enterprises. He posed a hypothetical question as to how his Government could try to change the situation. First, it was necessary to take into account that the Federal Constitutional Court had held that the ban on the right to strike of public servants was part of certain traditional principles outlined in the Constitution which could not be changed, because the Government could not influence case law. Consequently, the Constitution would have to be modified to grant the right to strike – but that would require a two-thirds majority in both Chambers. Moreover, there was a principle that strikes could only take place in Germany for a claim made in the framework of collective bargaining. Since this was again a question of case law, it could not be changed forcibly. As a result, a law concerning labour disputes would have to be adopted. Both social partners wanted the rules by which labour disputes were governed to be developed by case law, as was the case now, and not to be governed by the legislator. This would mean that the Government would have to work towards the adoption of a law governing labour disputes, contrary to the wishes of the social partners. This left his Government with one option of doing nothing, neither adopting legislation governing strike action, nor amending the Constitution. A solution could be that, whenever public servants did go on strike, the State as employer would not proceed against the strikers. However, the speaker was not sure that the Committee of Experts would agree with this solution. They would ask for an explicit change. The only alternative would be to do away with the officials of the public service altogether or to reduce the body of public servants to those with really important functions. It was impossible to predict at the moment if or when a consensus on such a solution would be reached.

The Workers' member of Germany stated that, even if the question could not be resolved in a short period of time, measures could nevertheless be taken, not necessarily through the adoption of a law on the right to strike at national level. In addition, he expressed his reservation as to the adoption of a transitory regulation when it related to the privatization of state enterprises, because it could take 30 or 40 years. Besides, he pointed out that the Federal Government could have done more to influence the process of amending the Federal Constitution towards the direction of a better clarification of the question. He further referred to the role of the Supreme Court, whose interpretation was based on the international law, and therefore also on the interpretation of the supervisory bodies of the ILO. Furthermore, the right to strike was interpreted in a divergent manner by the Federal Government and by German employers.

The Employers' members were also of the opinion that the situation could only be changed by time. Nevertheless, they observed that, when an official chose to enter the public service, it was because the jobs were attractive and the status gave him several advantages, in spite of the prohibition of the right to strike. He considered this was a trade-off. They drew attention to paragraph 160 of the General Survey.

The Workers' members expressed their hope that the Committee should adopt clear conclusions, on the one hand to avoid entering into the details of the modalities of strikes, and on the other hand, not to hesitate to request the Government to change what could be changed. The Government should be requested to put the national legislation and practice into conformity with the Convention. In addition, they pointed out that the number of public servants was quite big in Germany and that if the Employers' members' reasoning was followed in this regard, the notion of public servant (Beamte) should be limited. They concluded by insisting that the existence of a more favourable statute for the public servants should not constitute a reason for depriving them of the right to strike.

The Committee took note of the detailed information furnished by the Government representative. It noted that the Committee of Experts had formulated comments for several years regarding the application of Articles 3 and 10 of the Convention, which the Committee recalled were of fundamental character. The Committee expressed the hope that the next report of the Government would show evolutions that had taken place or were envisaged in order to ensure the full implementation of the rights recognized by the Convention to organizations of workers for the defence of economic, social and occupational interests of their members without interference on the part of the public authorities.

Myanmar (ratification: 1955). The Government supplied the following information:

In an observation on the labour laws in the Union of Myanmar, the Committee of Experts expressed its concern that no progress had been made with respect to the legislation, nor in practice, and urged the Government to take the necessary measures. The Myanmar Government is taking positive and concrete steps to put in place institutions that will establish, promote and nurture democratic principles and practices. With these objectives in view, a broad-based national convention comprising some 700 delegates representing the whole strata of Myanmar society was held. This convention has by consensus adopted 104 basic principles which will serve as the basis for a new State Constitution. Among these principles, the national convention has laid down that the State shall enact laws to protect the rights of the workers in the country. In May 1994, an opportunity was afforded by the relevant technical services of the International Labour Office for a brief preliminary discussion of some aspects of the new draft legislation to allow workers to establish trade unions, federations, etc., of their own choosing. These discussions took place between the ILO Technical Adviser based in New Delhi and the authorities in the Ministry of Labour, Government of the Union of Myanmar. The Government is of the view that further contacts should continue to be held between the Government and the International Labour Office to obtain technical advice that would contribute considerably towards its efforts in applying this Convention and the principle of freedom of association, etc. The Government is looking forward to these contacts with the International Labour Office and, subject to mutually convenient dates, preparations are being made to receive a technical assistance mission in Myanmar from the International Labour Office some time before the next session of the Committee of Experts. The Myanmar Government is making every effort to take further action with the technical assistance of the International Labour Office.

In addition, a Government representative recalled the transformation of the political and economic system of his country, including measures to draft a new State Constitution. The speaker quoted one of the basic constitutional principles laid down by the National Convention that "the State shall enact the necessary laws to protect the right of the workers". While measures were being taken to put in place democratic institutions including the rights of the workers to form their own unions, he considered that the present machinery for the protection of the rights of the workers was as strong and effective as ever: for example, the workers' welfare associations and several other professional and craft organizations were the forerunners of the trade unions to be established in the country. He further stated that a body known as the Laws Scrutiny Central Body was formed in 1990 to review the existing national legislation including labour laws, and that a law reviewing committee headed by the Minister of Labour was also formed. The relevant labour laws including the Trade Union Act of 1926 had been reviewed and redrafted in the national language since the advent of the State Law and Order Restoration Council (SLORC). The draft laws including that relating to the trade union had been forwarded to the Attorney General's office for a preliminary review and would be later submitted to the Laws Scrutiny Central Body. The Government representative also recalled the visit made in May 1994 by an ILO technical adviser on standards for an initial round of discussions on some aspects of the draft legislation. He stressed that such contacts should be continued to assist the Government in its efforts to ensure the application of the Convention. He concluded by confirming that the fundamental rights of workers continued to be the major concern of his Government which would make every effort to take further action with the assistance of the International Labour Office.

The Workers' members described this case as one of almost total despair, considering that the Convention had been ratified 40 years ago by the Government. Since then there had been ten observations by the Committee of Experts regarding the complete lack of progress in fulfilling obligations under the Convention; six long discussions of this case and the lack of any progress in the Conference Committee; no progress recorded in the report of the Committee of Experts; and mention of the case in a special paragraph of the report in both 1982 and 1993. Although there had been promises of a new Constitution respecting fundamental rights including freedom of association, and of new labour laws to replace old ones, there had been no concrete action and no real progress. The Convention was a cornerstone of human rights but it was neither complex nor difficult to implement if the Government really wished to meet its obligations. With regard to the current situation in Myanmar, they had learned from a reliable source that repression of trade unions existed, and that there was a climate of fear in which grave human rights violations continued. Moreover, the existence of independent trade unions was still illegal, and those who promoted them were punished. To show real progress, the Government needed to provide more specifics such as texts of new laws under consideration and the dates when they were planned to come into effect. They recognized that the 1994 intervention by the Office in the form of technical assistance represented an opportunity to move forward, and that a future meeting between the ILO staff and the Government administration might help the situation. Laws must be adopted that would permit the establishment of first-level unions as well as federations and confederations for workers of their own choosing, independent of previous government authorization. As this case was so deplorable, and as there had been a total lack of real progress, it was necessary for the Committee to express the need to act urgently and the need for discernable progress.

The Employers' members endorsed most of the declarations of the Workers' members. They noted that this case had been dealt with on seven occasions since 1987 and every year since 1991, and that in 1982 and 1993 it had been referred to in special paragraphs. The case had been around for a very long time, and there had been far too little action. They were concerned that the law provided for a trade union monopoly and that basic freedom of association was not guaranteed. In reference to the draft legislation under preparation which if enacted would constitute a substantial change, and the information from the Government regarding the technical assistance provided by the Office in May 1994, they said that usually one would be glad when requests were made by countries for technical assistance, as they often were a sign of determination to bring their legislation into conformity with the Convention. However, in this case, they felt that this was simply a delaying tactic, and that although the Government referred to 104 basic principles for the planned Constitution that had been adopted by consensus, in fact legislative preparation was at a very early stage. The Employers' members were less concerned with the finer details than with the establishment of the very basis of freedom of association. While the Government only referred to its plans to give workers the freedom to form trade unions, they urged that everyone, including employers, be entitled to form organizations of their choice as provided for under the Convention. They agreed with the Workers' members that the Committee had waited far too long for progress and they urged the Government to act quickly as it was a matter of urgency that changes be made.

The Government member of the United States said that upon reviewing the history of this case, she noted that since 1989 the Government had repeatedly said that there were political changes taking place in the country, that a period of transition was under way, and that there would be a new Constitution and new legislation that would conform to the Convention. However, these repeated promises had a hollow ring. Although the basis of the case had been a problem of trade union monopoly, she now considered that it was actually a total lack of freedom of association. While the legislation was not in conformity with the Convention, the practice was even worse as workers were not free to join organizations of their own choosing, and there were reported violations of civil liberties. In the past few years, not only the ILO but the United Nations Committee on Human Rights and the General Assembly had expressed their urgent concern regarding the lack of freedom of association in the country. It was encouraging that the Government had entered into discussions with the Office about this matter, and had requested future technical assistance. She supported any measures the Office and this Committee considered appropriate to ensure that the actions of the Government would, in the near future, match the promises made.

The Workers' member of Pakistan noted the great concern expressed in previous special paragraphs regarding this situation which urged the Government to bring its legislation into conformity with the Convention. Regulation No. 5 of 1976 did not permit the existence of independent unions freely chosen by workers. The Government had been making similar promises for several years, but there was no real progress in legislation and practice. He hoped that the Government would not merely confine itself to receiving advice from the Office, but that it would have the political will to protect freedom of association, as there could be no social justice without it.

The Government member of the Netherlands supported the statement of the Government member of the United States. He noted that the Government had been promising new labour laws to replace old ones for a very long time, but that no concrete progress had yet been made. Although one of the aims of the Convention was to create a level playing field, this was far from being achieved in Myanmar. He urged the Government to bring the legislation into conformity with the Convention, so that there could be true tripartism in which employers and workers played their proper roles.

The Workers' member of the Netherlands asked the Government representative to provide information on the existing practice with regard to the exercise of trade union rights in Myanmar in the absence of conforming legislation.

The Workers' member of Japan noted that the Government had made repeated assurances year after year regarding its intention to establish legislation in compliance with the Convention. However, he emphasized that empty assurances were no substitute for concrete progress. In his view, the case under consideration indicated a complete lack of freedom of association. Although the statement of the Government indicated that there were functioning workers' organizations in the country, he pointed out that the Workers' delegate for Myanmar at the Conference was a person who, in actual fact, did not represent any workers' organization.

The Government member of Norway, speaking on behalf of the Governments of the Nordic countries, noted with great interest the proposed laws that were intended to conform with the Convention. However, he pointed out that no real progress had been made in this respect in legislation or in practice. He hoped that there would soon be legislation in force that would permit independent trade unions, and that democratic rights would be established in Myanmar.

The Government representative stated that he had listened very attentively to the comments made by the delegates to the effect that there had been a lack of progress and repression of workers in his country. However, he insisted that concrete and positive steps had been taken and that there was a distinct improvement in the situation. In his view, the Workers' members had failed to take into proper consideration the second part of the letter of 9 June 1994 to the Office from the Director-General of the Myanmar Labour Department requesting technical assistance in which he had underlined the need for further contacts with the ILO to obtain technical advice that would contribute to the efforts of the Government in applying Convention No. 87 and the principles of freedom of association. He stressed that it was more productive to talk about the future rather than the past and stated that this letter and its contents were evidence of his Government's forward-looking attitude, and that there had been active consultation with the Office on some aspects of the draft trade union law. There was a misconception that trade union monopoly existed in Myanmar, as the one-party system had been abolished in 1988, and with it the trade union monopoly. Moreover, a Chamber of Commerce and Industry, whose chairman was an Employers' delegate at this Conference, existed in his country and was functioning effectively. The Government was making every effort to establish democratic institutions including trade unions, and was in the process of revising its legislation on trade unions to conform with the new political and economic system. This was testimony to the efforts being made by his Government in good faith and with sincerity to take further necessary measures with the assistance of the ILO.

The Workers' member of the Netherlands reiterated his previous request for information about the current practice in Myanmar, and in particular details about the functioning of trade unions and employers' organizations, and their ability to freely form and elect their leaders, and to engage in collective bargaining.

The Employers' members could not see that any progress had been made in the immediate past. Although it was true that one should look to the future, expectations for the future were based on past experience, which in this case was very negative. They reiterated that it was favourable that there had been a preliminary mission by the Office and that further technical assistance had been requested. However, it seemed that the Government was engaging in tactics that would lead to further delay in taking measures. In view of the 40 years that had passed since ratification of the Convention, they asked that rapid measures be taken, and urged that substantive changes be made.

The Workers' members strongly reiterated what they had said in their previous statement, and stood solidly on their statements about the actual practice in Myanmar, which contrasted sharply with the promises of reform. They also agreed entirely with the insistence of the Employers' members on employers' rights to freedom of association.

The Committee noted the written information provided by the Government and the statement made by the Government representative as well as the discussion which took place in the Committee. The Committee regretted that despite the assurances made by the Government to the effect that it was involved in the process of changing legislation in order to guarantee trade union rights, no tangible sign of improvement had been visible to the Committee of Experts. The Committee noted, however, that since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, a preliminary discussion with the ILO took place in the country relating to certain aspects of draft legislation. In addition the Committee noted that the Government requested a technical assistance mission to be sent to the country before the next session of the Committee of Experts. While reiterating its deep concern with the situation, the Committee urged the Government to adopt at an early date all the necessary measures urgently needed to guarantee that in law and in practice, employers and workers, without distinction of any kind and without previous authorization, may have the right to associate and that workers have the right to join trade unions of their choice outside the existent trade union structure, and trade unions the right to establish federations and confederations without impediment. The Committee expressed the firm hope that in the very near future it would be in a position to register real substantial progress in the application in law and in practice of the Convention, and it requested the Government to send a detailed report to the Committee of Experts so as to allow it to make an assessment of progress made by next year.

Pakistan (ratification: 1951). The Government supplied the following information:

1. With regard to the observation of the Committee of Experts concerning the ban on trade union membership and activities for employees of the Pakistan Television Corporation (PTVC) and the Pakistan Broadcasting Corporation (PBC), it is pointed out that the workers of the PTVC and the PBC in the past used to exercise trade union rights. During the martial law regime, television stations were occupied by the then trade union leadership. This action was taken contrary to the discipline enforced by the then Army regime. As a result, the employees of both PTV and PBC were excluded from the provision of Industrial Relations Ordinance, 1969, by an amendment to the law since they belonged to the sensitive field of information. This matter recently has been placed for deliberation before the tripartite Task Force on Labour constituted by the Prime Minister of Pakistan, inter alia, to suggest ways and means to bring national labour laws into conformity with ILO Conventions. A subcommittee constituted by the Task Force has recently heard the representatives of workers and employers of both these organizations who have favoured the restoration of trade union rights to these employees, subject to certain appropriate conditions where discipline may be reinforced in view of the sensitivity of information media. The Government may decide to restore trade union activities to these organizations after the Task Force finally submits its recommendations to the competent authority, i.e. the Cabinet for approval. The Ministry of Labour will let the Committee know of the outcome of the decision in the matter.

2. So far as the observation of the Committee of Experts concerning denial of the rights guaranteed by the Convention for workers in export processing zones (EPZs) is concerned, it is stated that although the EPZs have been exempted from the application of certain labour laws, the conditions of employment of their employees are regulated by the Export Processing Zone Authority (Control of Employment) Rules, 1982. These rules provide for a separate system of rights of their workers and for the resolution of their grievances. Moreover, the benefits that accrue to these workers are better when compared to those of other workers. It may also be mentioned that at present there is only one EPZ that has been established in Karachi. Fewer than 6,000 workers are employed by the Karachi Export Processing Zone (KEPZ), with around 80 per cent female labour. Since the cultural climate in Pakistan is not in favour of unionization of female workers due to social taboos, those workers themselves do not demand that trade union rights within the meaning of Industrial Relations Ordinance, 1969, be restored to them. However, there is no bar on their forming any association. Exemption of labour laws was granted to EPZs for reasons of Pakistan's deal with foreign investors. The matter is under the Government's consideration in order to see how to apply labour laws equally to all enterprises without discrimination. In the case of the KEPZ, the withdrawal of the exemption is a matter that will have to be seen in line with the deal made with foreign investors who have invested in this zone on the basis of certain exemptions provided to them. In any case, as already stated, the employment conditions in this zone are no less favourable than under the existing labour laws. The workers of this zone have never complained in any manner about their rights. Rather, they seem to be more content and satisfied with the arrangement as explained above in detail. The present Government, in view of its election manifesto, is more committed to the cause of labour than the previous Government and is determined to redeem its pledges to protect the rights of labour in the light of ILO standards. The terms of reference being considered by the Task Force on Labour provide for simplification, consolidation and codification of labour laws. The deliberations of the Task Force in this regard may culminate in its recommendation for the establishment of a permanent commission on codification of labour laws. It will also be the responsibility of the commission to see that all labour laws are brought into conformity with ILO Conventions. Pakistan's ratification of ILO Conventions Nos. 87 and 98 has created a climate whereby a democratic approach is being used in resolving labour problems and disputes pertaining to the employer-employee relationship on a collective basis. Fundamentally, this is a positive development in the field of industrial relations. Since Pakistan is a newborn State, it has taken initiatives to build up national infrastructures and has to rely more on its own economic activities. In such circumstances, no nation can easily afford the cost of a social programme when measured against economic viability. But Pakistan's initiative in the social sector itself is proof of its intentions and it will bring change in the living standards of the poor masses and the working community. Change is inevitable as soon as matters have improved to a point where it will be possible to run the affairs of the country at par with those nations that have passed this transitory phase.

3. As a result of the administrative reforms of 1973, all civil service associations representing civil servants, prior to 20 August 1973, have ceased to exist. However, civil service associations other than regularly constituted associations which were functioning prior to the introduction of the administrative reforms have been allowed to continue to function as before. At present there is no bar on the formation of associations of different categories of employees; this is fairly in consonance with the provisions of this Convention. However, federal government employees, as well as all the four provincial governments' employees, are subject to certain restrictions to avoid the carrying out of activities that are harmful to the basic aims and objectives of their establishments, such as the engagement of employees and their organizations in political activities, the issuance of periodical publications or publishing representations of their members without prior government approval. This is a purely administrative measure to maintain discipline and the smooth running of the public establishments which in no way can be termed to be in contravention with Articles 2 and 3 of this Convention. The rights granted to employees under these provisions are being exercised by them in full freedom. However, the restriction mentioned above is in the vital interest of the public establishments as well as the employees, to achieve the goals of efficiency leading to greater productivity and production. In the context of the Pakistan Essential Services (Maintenance) Act, 1952, "essential service" means an employment or a class of employment which is essential in the opinion of the federal Government for securing the defence or security of Pakistan or any part thereof or for the maintenance of such supplies or services as are essential to the life of the community. The above criterion is applied in keeping with national considerations and objectives while applying the law in question to employment of an essential nature. It may be mentioned that an ILO mission headed by Sir John Wood that visited Pakistan has treated the issue of essential services in its report as a complicated matter on which generalizations are difficult to make and apply. The mission has formed the opinion that in general terms, the basis for exclusion must be a serious matter for health, safety and law and order. If this is taken as an ILO criterion, Pakistan has acted very carefully in extending the application of this law to certain organizations. It is not correct that the Pakistan Essential Services (Maintenance) Act, 1952, has been broadly applied to employment organizations such as the post and telegraph services, railways, airways and ports. Due care is taken when extending the application of this law to any organization for a limited period of time, and for that purpose the request of the employing organization is thoroughly examined by the Ministry of Interior and the Ministry of Labour. Only those which meet defence needs or concern the life of the community can be considered to be covered by the said law which virtually does not prohibit trade union activity. An explanation recently issued by the Interior Division in respect of the application of this law is reproduced below:

> ... the application of this Act to an organization does not take away workers' rights of collective bargaining. The provisions of the Essential Services Act and the rules made thereunder empower the Chairman, NIRC, to regulate the wages and other conditions of services of persons or class of persons engaged in any employment or class of employment to which the Act/Rules apply. Accordingly the settlement reached between the management and the CBA are authenticated by the Chairman, NIRC, and forwarded to the Ministry of Interior for notification in the gazette of Pakistan. Furthermore the Act also does not impose any ban on trade union activity.

As pointed out, the main thrust of the Government of Pakistan is to ensure the economic viability of national priority programmes. Pakistan cannot afford industrial action, including strikes or lockouts, to continue for an indefinite period. Therefore, it is in the national interest to put a check on this right. This check presently serves as a deterrent, but the parties themselves have hardly ever resorted to a strike or lockout for a period of even up to 30 days. Such a restriction on the initiation of industrial action – which may be more undemocratic – does not exist in Pakistan's legal system.

4. The management of Pakistan International Airlines Corporation (PIAC) is implementing the terms and conditions of ILO Conventions (Nos. 87 and 98) within the scope of the provisions contained in various labour laws. Consequent upon amendment of section 10 of the PIAC Act, 1956, the applicability of the Industrial Relations Ordinance, 1969, has been restored and the formation of unions in the PIAC has already been allowed. Due to the existence of unions in the establishment, the collective bargaining agent (CBA) has also been determined by the National Industrial Relations Commission through a referendum conducted in 1992 for a term of two years ending August 1994. The CBA and management have already signed an agreement on the revision of wages, allowances and on the review of terms and conditions of employment, keeping in mind the welfare of the employees. The matter pertaining to the withdrawal of the application of the Pakistan Essential Services (Maintenance) Act, 1952, to this and other establishments mentioned above is under the consideration of the tripartite Task Force. The recommendations of the Task Force on this issue will be submitted to the competent authority, i.e. the Cabinet, for approval. The list of establishments covered by this Act will be modified in accordance with the decision of the Cabinet and will be reported in the next annual report.

5. So far as the right of representation of minority unions is concerned, the federal Government and provincial governments have so far not faced any problems on this account as these rights are adequately protected by the IRO of 1969 and grievances, if any, are redressed by the courts of law. Moreover, these interests are properly looked after by the respective CBA unions. Collective agreements entered into by the CBAs are binding on all types of workers, and as such, benefits under such agreements are granted to non-CBA members as well. However, the Government has taken note of the observation and is taking all possible measures which are in consonance with this Convention, to protect the rights of minority unions accordingly.

6. The Government reiterates its previous explanation with regard to the allegations made in the complaint (Case No. 1534) by the Pakistan National Federation of Trade Unions against the alleged anti-union policy of multinational companies in Pakistan. It affirms that section 15(i) provides protection against anti-union acts and that, if in effect false promotions occurred, whereby the employees received higher wages but not the corresponding change of task to a supervisory role, the employees could use the unfair labour practice provisions of section 22(A)(8)(g) of the IRO and eventually go to the labour courts for redress. It is further stated that although the Federation has lodged no complaint against the Government of Pakistan as such, it is however aggrieved by certain decisions of the management of some of the multinational companies operating in Pakistan. Since the complaint is against one civil person by another civil person, the aggrieved party can get redress by approaching the judicial bodies established for the purpose in the country. This matter was also discussed at length during the visit of the abovementioned ILO mission. This is a matter between the management and the workers and the Government has no role to play in their relationship.

7. It is not correct to say that the employees working in the public and private sector hospitals and clinics are deprived of their right to form trade unions. However, in order to secure the defence or the security of Pakistan or any part thereof and to maintain such supplies or services which are essential to the life of the community, some services have been declared as essential services under the Pakistan Essential Services (Maintenance) Act, 1952. The application of this Act does not mean that the workers have no right to organize as guaranteed to them under this Convention. Hence, they have the legal right to form associations.

In addition, the Government representative stated that his Government welcomed the ILO's attention towards the labour rights situation in Pakistan, as well as the recent ILO direct contacts mission which advised the Government on matters relating to workers' rights and compliance with ratified Conventions. Recognizing that many of the observations made by the Committee of Experts regarding his country were not without reason, he admitted that there was child labour in Pakistan and that there were curbs on workers' rights in some establishments, especially those falling under the Essential Services Act. Commenting on the recent developments in his country, he stated that the new Government had the firm commitment to protect workers' rights and had set up a special tripartite Task Force on Labour. The recommendations of this Task Force would shortly be submitted to the Government and would form the basis of a new labour policy to ensure harmonious labour-management relations. Already the present Government had decided not to apply the Essential Services Act to any new establishment and to redefine it with a view to bringing it into conformity with the Convention. The existing list of the establishments under the Act would gradually be reduced to a minimum: three of the establishments had already been removed from the list. In addition, the Government had decided to sign a Memorandum of Understanding with the ILO to launch a programme for the gradual elimination of child labour. The supervisory machinery has been geared up to check violations of labour laws, especially the laws relating to child labour and bonded labour. In order to celebrate the 75th anniversary of the ILO, the Government had decided to ratify two Conventions, namely the Tripartite Consultations (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144), and the Vocational Rehabilitation and Employment (Disabled Persons) Convention, 1983 (No. 159). As to the observation of the Committee of Experts on the application of Convention No. 87, he stated that these matters had been referred to the Task Force on Labour and that the ILO would be informed of the outcome in due course. He requested the Committee to give reasonable time to the new Government to take decisions on the recommendations of the Task Force and of the ILO direct contacts mission.

The Employers' members recalled that this case had been discussed since 1981 and had been the subject of a special paragraph in 1987. Today, they welcomed a whole series of positive indications from the Government, not only with respect to Convention No. 87 but on other important issues as well. They noted with satisfaction that the direct contacts mission to Pakistan had taken place in January 1994 and that the Government wanted to receive continuing assistance. The written information furnished by the Government had provided this Committee with details on the work of the tripartite Task Force on Labour. The Employers' members urged the Government to take account of paragraph 160 of the General Survey of the Committee of Experts concerning strikes in essential services. They asked the Government representative to indicate how ILO technical assistance and the information from the direct contacts mission was being used by the Task Force, particularly in the formulation of new legislation. Finally, the Employers' members urged rapid enactment of the appropriate legislation to bring Pakistan's labour law into line with the Convention.

The Workers' members, noting that the Task Force would be reporting fairly shortly to the Government, wanted more precise indications as to when the Task Force would finally complete its work, whether it had taken into account all the observations made by the direct contacts mission of the ILO, and how quickly its recommendations could be passed into law. They pointed out that the information given by the Government representative on the action taken to limit the number of areas where strikes were forbidden should be provided to the Committee of Experts so that it could determine whether these were areas where strikes should be prohibited.

The Government representative reiterated that the new Government elected eight months ago was deeply concerned with the welfare of workers and was trying to expedite the recommendations of the Task Force in order to formulate a new labour policy. He expected the Task Force to be presenting its report in July 1994 but pointed out that, while executive decisions on its recommendations could be taken fairly quickly, matters requiring legislation would take a much longer time. The recommendations of the ILO direct contacts mission had been made available to the Task Force which would be making its own recommendations in the light of this mission's report.

The Workers' member of Greece thanked the Government representative for the information supplied, but indicated that, in his view, no replies were provided on the two questions raised in a very clear manner in the report of the Committee of Experts. These concerned the prohibition on employees of the Pakistan Television Corporation as well as on employees in the public and private hospitals, to establish or to join trade unions. He considered that removing the ban for the workers to establish trade unions did not require an enormous legislative work and it sufficed to repeal the relevant provisions.

The Government representative stated that the question of the ban on trade union activities in the Pakistan Television Corporation and the Pakistan Broadcasting Corporation was among the items on the agenda of the Task Force which would be making appropriate recommendations. As for hospital workers, this issue had not yet come up before the Task Force but he assured the Committee that it would be put before the Task Force as a matter to be included in its final recommendations on his return. The question of civil servants could also be placed before the Task Force. However, according to a new ruling of the Supreme Court, those working in the service of the State could not form trade unions, but they did have the right to form associations.

The Workers' member of Pakistan pointed out that it was the responsibility of the Government to bring the national legislation into conformity with the Convention by removing the restrictions imposed on trade union activities in relation to radio, television, hospital and other areas pointed out by the Committee of Experts, including the export processing zones. He recalled that a complaint had been lodged before the Committee on Freedom of Association on these very issues. At the time of its election in October 1993 the new Government gave a pledge to the workers that the national labour legislation would be brought into conformity with the ILO standards, and it had now the responsibility to do so in the light of the recommendations made by the ILO direct contacts mission. Pointing out that workers were represented on the tripartite Task Force, he emphasized however that it was the Government's responsibility to put its recommendations into practice as soon as possible. He invited the Committee to urge the Government to honour its commitment to the ILO in the large interests of industrial peace and the welfare of the workers.

The Committee took note of the written and oral information supplied by the Government. It welcomed the direct contacts mission which took place in Pakistan in January 1994. It noted that the mission's report had been forwarded to the Government to serve as the basis for the tripartite Task Force recently created to solve difficulties in the application of the Conventions. The Committee strongly hoped that, in the light of the observations of the Committee of Experts and of the comments and explanations given to the Government by the direct contacts mission, it would be able to review its position and to indicate in its next report the specific measures taken to bring the whole of its legislation and practice into conformity with the requirements of the Convention. The Committee hoped that the next detailed report of the Government would show that decisive progress had been made in relation to the right of all workers, without distinction whatsoever, to establish and join organizations of their own choosing, in the private as well as in the public sector, including the export processing zones.

Bangladesh (ratification: 1972). A Government representative of Bangladesh described the steps being taken to bring labour legislation into compliance with the Convention. In particular, he referred to the establishment of a National Labour Law Commission in 1992, led by a senior court judge, which was tripartite in structure and included eminent legal experts. The recommendations of this Commission dealt with all points mentioned in the report of the Committee of Experts, and were submitted to the Prime Minister on 4 June 1994. In addition, the Tripartite Labour Committee headed by the Minister of Labour and Manpower as well as the Parliamentary Standing Committee on Labour Matters, on which members of the opposition were represented, would provide their input into the drafting of a comprehensive labour code. He hoped that next year he would be able to inform the Committee that all problems raised in the observations of the Committee of Experts had been resolved.

The Workers' members stated that the problems regarding the application of the Convention were serious and long-standing and had been reported on by the Committee of Experts for a number of years. These included restrictions on voluntary bargaining in the private and public sectors, lack of protection for workers' organizations against acts of interference, and the denial of the right to engage in collective bargaining for workers in export processing zones. In view of the work of the National Labour Law Commission, which had already made recommendations on revisions to labour legislation that would address current problems of non-compliance with the Convention, they expressed cautious optimism that reasonably rapid changes would take place. They asked that the case be discussed once again next year in this Committee, so that they might determine whether the planned changes had actually occurred.

The Employers' members also were to a certain extent hopeful and noted a measure of progress, particularly because of the difference in the posture of the new and democratic Government from that when the case had been previously discussed. Although the National Labour Law Commission had made its recommendations, he appreciated that their incorporation into legislation would be time-consuming. In order to hasten the process, he urged the Government to consider requesting technical assistance from the ILO to assist in determining whether the proposed legislation would comply with Convention No. 98 and related Conventions.

The Workers' member of Poland reiterated the declaration of the Workers' members, in particular referring to restrictions on collective bargaining for small businesses, the public sector and the export processing zone, and noted the long history of this case. With regard to export processing zones, he referred to the Tripartite Declaration of Principles concerning Multinational Enterprises and Social Policy, which stated that there should be no limitation of workers' freedom of association and right to organize and bargain collectively as part of any incentives offered by countries to attract foreign investment. Export processing zones were used as a pretext to avoid the application of basic workers' rights. He concluded by emphasizing that in such a persistent case as this, technical assistance by the ILO would not replace an absence of the goodwill needed for the legislation to be brought into conformity with the Convention.

The Government representative reiterated his previous declaration and confirmed his hope that the problems with regard to the application of the Convention would be resolved by next year.

The Committee took note of the statement made by the Government representative and the discussion which took place. The Committee believed that the next report from the Government would make it possible to note real progress in the application of the Convention and, in particular, that the Government would be able to report next year on specific measures to guarantee the explicit protection of workers' organizations against measures of interference by employers in order to truly promote the voluntary application of collective bargaining agreements, in particular in small enterprises and in the public sector, and to amend the Bangladesh Export Processing Zones Authority Act 1980 to explicitly state that workers in those zones should benefit from the rights guaranteed by Articles 1, 2 and 4 of the Convention. The Committee reminded the Government that technical assistance of the International Labour Office could, to a great extent, contribute to helping the Government to bring its legislation into conformity with the requirements of the Convention in these areas.

Cameroon (ratification: 1962). See under Convention No. 87.

Colombia (ratification: 1976). A Government representative expressed his satisfaction and that of his Government with the recognition by the Committee of Experts of the progress accomplished in his country in different domains of legislation. Progress had been made in the forming of trade union organizations without advance authorization, their right to freely organize their internal administration, their power to intervene in certain political questions and the adoption of measures to reinforce protection against anti-union discrimination. These results demonstrated the Government's will to give full effect to the ILO Conventions ratified by his country. He agreed with the opinion of the Committee of Experts when they declared that this progress bore witness to the vitality of the ILO's system of control of the application of standards and the essential contribution of tripartitism to this process. He underlined the efforts being put in place by his Government concerning the timely sending of reports on the different Conventions and it should be noted that the number of observations made by the Committee of Experts on his country has diminished from one year to the next. There are now only four observations for 17 Conventions for which reports were submitted. Colombia was also cited among the countries having communicated reports signalling important changes in the application of Conventions. The speaker recalled the important role played by the ILO in technical cooperation which has assisted in the progress on standards for his Government. Touching the observations formulated by the Committee of Experts concerning the application of Convention No. 98, especially concerning the place accorded in the legislation to the definition of public employees which determined the possibility for certain workers to present collective bargaining proposals, he indicated that the existing Constitution recognized the separation of powers and that the Congress of the Republic had the exclusive competence for fixing the conditions of workers and the conditions of work of these workers. This explained the divergence noted by the Committee. Concerning the absence of protection for union members who were civil servants, the speaker pointed out that the recent ruling of the Supreme Court was approved after the last report was sent. This ruling declared that all provisions allowing such discrimination were contrary to the Constitution. In consequence, today there was no longer any obstacle to the exercise of union activities whether it be in the public or private sector. To conclude, the speaker underlined the efforts of his Government towards consolidating institutions in all domains with the goal of improving the conditions in which work relations develop, and he reaffirmed the strong will of his Government to continue their efforts to bring his legislation into conformity with ratified Conventions.

The Workers' members stated that work in the Conference Committee often required reading between the lines to understand the context in which events were occurring in a country. They pointed out that they had read documents prepared by ICFTU and Amnesty International on Colombia concerning human rights. The Committee of Experts has encouraged cooperation between supervisory bodies and non-governmental organizations. From these documents and the organizations, one learned that, in spite of political and economic changes occurring in the country, there were still a number of serious dilemmas to be faced. It was alleged that more trade unionists were killed in Colombia than in any other country in the world. The lives of trade union officials in Colombia were in peril. As an indication of the problems, the Workers' members cited the fact that there are currently eight complaints pending before the Committee on Freedom of Association, four of which concerned very serious acts of trade union discrimination. The Report of the Committee of Experts examined anti-trade union discrimination in the public sector. The Conference Committee examined this problem first in 1989 and it was also discussed in 1991 and 1992. A direct contacts mission took place in 1991. The Government should be aware of the fact that their legislation did not conform to the Convention. They noted that certain public servants in Colombia had no immunity if they joined a trade union, and certain civil servants were denied the right to collective bargaining. The Government representative had referred to recent legislation which would have a bearing on this, and they were sure the Committee of Experts would like to see this. What the Committee of Experts said was that existing formulations of the laws allowed neither proper trade unionism nor collective bargaining to take place in various parts of the civil service. The Workers' members wished to underscore the fact that when a country ratified Convention No. 98, it committed itself to allowing civil servants the right to organize and bargain collectively. Existing laws allowed only "humble petitions" under Section 414 of the Code, which the Government maintained establish the right to collective bargaining. They believed the Employers' members would agree that "humble petitions" would not bring the national legislation into conformity with this Convention. No indication had been given that legislation would be changed on the two precise points raised by the Committee of Experts. If this was correct, the Workers' members felt that the conclusions should draw attention to the fact that existing legislation is not in conformity with Convention No. 98.

The Employers' members pointed out that the Conference Committee had dealt with Colombia on several occasions. In 1991, a direct contacts mission took place. Comparing this year's report with previous ones, it was fair to say that some change had occurred in the interim although it was not actually specified. The Workers' members had pointed out that there was a great deal of violence in Colombia, but the violence was not limited to workers and trade unions. It affected everyone. They turned to the specific problems: the absence of protection for employees who were trade union members of a mixed organization; and the denial of the right to collective bargaining for civil servants. The Committee of Experts considered that the term "public employees" was defined too broadly. Concerning the first point, the Employers' members noted that there was a deficiency in the country's legislation. The Government representative, however, had pointed out that a recent ruling handed by the Supreme Court had done away with this exclusion. To verify this, they requested that the Government representative send a copy of the new ruling to the Committee of Experts as soon as possible to allow them to assess the situation. Concerning the second point, the Committee of Experts noted that there was a discrepancy in legislation compared to the obligations of the Convention. The Presidential Directive No. 38 of 1990 still excluded too many public service employees from the right to bargain collectively. The Committee of Experts had stated that the definition of public employee needs to be narrowed down, but they had not pointed out how that could be done. This might form the terms of reference for a direct contacts mission. The Employers' members concluded by suggesting that the Conference Committee request the Government of Colombia to consider carefully the indications and recommendations of the Committee of Experts and to act on them to remove any discrepancies. They also reiterated that a copy of the new ruling of the Supreme Court which the Government representative referred to should be sent to the Committee of Experts.

The Workers' member of Norway also spoke on behalf of Denmark, Finland, Iceland and Sweden. He expressed the opinion that the case of anti-union discrimination by the State and the denial to civil servants of the right to collective bargaining were extremely grave problems. He referred to the last report of the ICFTU and noted the serious attacks against unionism including the murders of union militants. The government authorities of Colombia not only refused to respect the right of civil servants to bargain collectively with their employer, which was provided for in the Convention, but they also practiced anti-union discrimination by means of legislation and regulations which paralysed possible union activities. The speaker requested the Government representative to point out what measures it had taken to protect militant unionists who sought the right to bargain collectively and, to conclude, he called on the Government to implement the decisions of the ILO's supervisory bodies.

The Workers' member of Colombia declared that he was in total agreement with the report of the Committee of Experts. Colombian workers did not have trade union freedom and civil servants did not have the right to collectively bargain. He deplored the fact that the recommendations of this Committee were reiterated continuously and that they had become nothing but a habit. He pointed out that, when the Government claimed to have taken measures, it had in fact acted completely differently. For example, although the Constitution of 1991 guaranteed the right to strike, with the exception of essential public services, there was no legislation which guaranteed this right, and Law No. 50 prohibiting the right to strike for certain public employees continued to be applied. The speaker declared that the Government had not honoured its engagements and had not implemented the recommendations of the Committee of Experts concerning the dialogue with the social partners and did not take into account their proposals. A proposal for a labour legislation law, which was supported by a million signatures, had not been discussed by the Parliament while a proposal to privatize social security had been presented to Parliament as a priority for discussion. The speaker denounced the impunity of anti-union acts which remain the rule in his country. More than 1,500 union militants had been assassinated and almost 180 last year. He denounced the false image that the Government would like to give of the country and notably the Government's wish to cover up the realities of the situation of human rights and trade union freedom. To conclude, he asked the Committee to adopt firm conclusions.

The Government member of Venezuela declared that he was happy to note progress in the situation in Colombia concerning international labour standards. He recalled that the case of Colombia was set in the context of a great amount of violence which affected all sectors including trade unions. He considered that the solution was not simply the job of the Government, but nevertheless, there had been progress in this regard. Attesting to this was the fight against organized crime and the accords concluded with certain guerilla movements which had participated in recent elections. He believed it reasonable to hope that, with progress towards national pacification, it would become easier to respect international labour standards ratified by Colombia. Referring to the observations of the Committee of Experts, he felt that a certain legal point should be examined by them. In the legislative doctrine of work in Latin America, the limit between the right to work includes, in general terms, the right to collective bargaining. On the other hand, the administrative right to work of the civil service recognizes certain restrictions to this right. The speaker considered that the problem calls for clarification as to the distinction made, in Colombian legislation, between "public employees" and "official workers", as well as the use of the concept of "civil servants engaged in the administration of the State". This concept should be the object of profound study since it concerned a complex question and a very important current subject in Latin America.

The Workers' member of Pakistan deplored the violence that existed in Colombia and the fact that it was estimated that 180 trade unionists were killed there last year. There was a need to change this situation rapidly. The speaker pointed out that public employees constituted the bulk of the labour force in most developing countries. Countries that have ratified Conventions Nos. 87 and 98 were required to provide immunity against anti-union discrimination as well as permit the right to collective bargaining to public employees. The Government should be a model for the private sector in the area of workers' rights. Where civil servants were denied such basic rights as immunity from anti-union discrimination and collective bargaining, the private sector might follow in the same path. The speaker fully supported the request that the Government should be requested to send the new Supreme Court ruling to the Committee of Experts as soon as possible and that they should change legislation to bring it into conformity with the obligations of Convention No. 98.

Another Worker member of Colombia, after thanking the Committee of Experts for having presented the case concerning the non-respect of a certain number of workers' rights in his country, dealt with the situation of civil servants. He declared that, under the cover of the modernization of the State, more than 80,000 civil servants had lost their jobs in the last four years. This category of workers could not exercise union rights and express its demands. Collective bargaining was limited to simply presenting "humble petitions". He wished the Committee of Experts to follow up on the work it has done on these problems and to call upon the Government to take concrete political measures that would result in real change.

The Government representative recognized the positive character of the various interventions, and declared that his Government was far from trying to hide the reality of the violence (which had multiple causes) which reigns in Colombia and causes grave problems to the trade union movement. In applying constitutional legislation, the system of protection of the freedom of trade unions and human rights had been developed. This had been witnessed in the last two years by the examination of some 30,000 cases among which many concerned the protection of the right of association and the questions of work. Constitutional reforms had also been undertaken. Commissions of Human Rights had been created in the Senate and in the Chamber. Conforming to Government policy in the development of protection and the fight against impunity of crimes, 5,000 members of the national police had had their employment terminated in order to reorient this institution toward the protection of citizens. Two laws concerning education in the area of human rights had been adopted and in 1993, two projects aimed at stopping "disappearances" had been elaborated. A service of human rights had been constituted under the Administrative Department of Security, and a competent ombudsman in matters of human rights had been designated. These actions had the objective of breaking the cycle of violence and impunity. Today there was a reduction in the violence parallel to the development of the system for protection of workers. It could not be said that the Government exercised a policy of violence, even if certain agents of the State had been guilty of such acts. In any event, his Government had the principal objective of ending impunity. The budget consecrated to justice in the country had been doubled. To conclude, the speaker thanked the Government member of Venezuela for his useful proposals.

The Workers' members recognized that while violence affected everyone, its tendency in Colombia was to touch those involved in human rights issues the most. These persons were trade unionists, politicians and lawyers: they were the ones who stood up for human rights and they were affected most by violence. The Government representative maintained that progress had been made. They wished to remind the Conference Committee that the discussion had been limited to problems facing civil servants. The major discussion for Colombia concerned Convention No. 87 on freedom of association, and there was no report on that Convention this year. Presumably that would be next year, and at that time the Conference Committee would be in a better position to judge what progress had been made. They hoped, along with the Employers' members, that the new Supreme Court ruling would completely eliminate anti-union discrimination and guarantee the right to collective bargaining for civil servants in one fell swoop. It should be remembered, however, that the ruling needed to be translated into legislation. The Committee of Experts would be able to judge the efficacy of the new ruling once the necessary measures had been taken.

The Committee noted the statement provided by the Government representative and the discussions which had taken place. It recalled that in 1992, the Committee requested the Government to modify its legislation so that it would conform to the suggestions of the Committee of Experts and report on the amendments adopted. The Committee noted the comments of the Committee of Experts according to which although civil servants had the right to organize, the law did not protect them against acts of anti-union discrimination and prohibited collective bargaining. The Committee expressed the strong hope that, given the explanations of the Committee of Experts and the discussions that had taken place, the Government would take the necessary measures to guarantee this category of workers (with perhaps the sole exception of public servants engaged in the administration of the State), protection against anti-union discrimination and the right to collective bargaining on their conditions of employment, as guaranteed by Articles 1 and 4 of the Convention. The Committee requested the Government, taking account of the many complaints presented before the Committee on Freedom of Association, to reinforce the protection against acts of anti-union discrimination in both the public and private sectors. The Committee hoped that the next report of the Government would furnish detailed information on the legislative or jurisprudential evolution relative to these questions and that these would show evidence of progress leading to a full application of the Convention.

The Government representative of Colombia wished to point out that there was no longer an absence of protection of trade union rights for civil servants as had been mentioned by the Committee of Experts in its observations. A new ruling of the Supreme Court had been given recently, and the text would be communicated without delay to the ILO. He made it clear that additional legislative measures would not be necessary.

Indonesia (ratification: 1957). The Government supplied the following information:

1. Act No. 14 of 1969 on the Basic Provisions respecting Manpower is a comprehensive law which includes industrial relations aspects. Although the provisions of the Act are still relevant in the Indonesian situation of labour standards, the Government realizes that it needs some adjustment to accommodate recent developments in industrial relations, particularly in facing the Second Long-Term Development. Therefore, the Government of Indonesia decided to review and revise the labour legislation. This programme consists of Act No. 14 of 1969 and Act No. 1 of 1951. Apart from that, the need was realized to have brand new regulations on employment and apprenticeship. So for the past five years, the Government has been working on four texts of labour legislation simultaneously. As the Government realizes that this programme is a very big job and a very delicate process, it has stated its intention to get technical assistance from the ILO.

2. The Minister of Manpower Regulation No. 01/1994 concerning Trade Unions at Company Level (SPTP) gives a wide opportunity to workers at the plant level to establish an organization with no obligation to join any particular organization. This organization will be able to bargain and negotiate a collective labour agreement with their employers.

Some provisions in this regulation stipulate the following:

Article 4(1). Workers at plant level with no fewer than 25 members may establish a workers' organization, unless there already is an existing trade union in the company concerned.

Article 17. A workers' organization at company level has the right to bargain and to negotiate a collective labour agreement based on the existing regulation.

Thus, this new regulation gives a broader opportunity to the workers at plant level whether they prefer to establish the organization under this regulation or whether they would like to join the existing trade union, i.e. SPSI.

3. The law and regulation in Indonesia guarantee workers' protection against anti-union discrimination and employer intervention in union membership. Even the 1945 constitution secures the freedom to organize and to express opinion.

4. The protection against anti-union discrimination is explicitly stated in the following:

(a) Article 8, paragraph (a) of the Minister of Manpower Regulation No. 04/1986 and Circular Letter of the Director General for Industrial Relations and Labour Standards No. 113/M/BW/1990 in which it is stated that:
The permit to terminate an employment shall not be given under the condition that the termination is conducted on the basis of the establishment or union membership.

(b) Ministerial Manpower Decree No. 438 of 1992 explained that the employer shall not take any unfavourable action towards the workers on the basis of trade union membership whether as union official or as a member of trade union.

5. Regarding the proposal to give more penalties for those who act against labour law including provision of the principle of freedom to organize, the Government declares to share this idea and it has been discussed and decided accordingly.

6. In line with the Government's intention to implement labour regulation, it has conducted law enforcement through the court.

7. The Government agrees that industrial relations mainly concern workers' and employers' interests. Therefore, in January 1994, it has withdrawn Minister of Manpower Decree No. 342 on Guidance for Conciliation in the Settlement of Industrial Disputes, particularly in facing various cases respecting overtime pay, strike, contract workers, termination of employment and the change of ownership of the company and replaced it with Minister Decree No. 15A on Guidance for the Settlement of Industrial Disputes and Termination of Employment at Company Level and Conciliation. The latest Decree replaces three Ministerial Decrees, i.e. No. 342/1984, No. 1108/1986, No. 120/1988, all of them concerning industrial dispute settlement. By doing so, the process of industrial dispute settlement in Indonesia has been simplified.

In addition, the Government representative stated that an overall review of national legislation concerning the right to organize and to bargain collectively was an enormous task. It was being undertaken with a view to coping with the need for just and democratic industrial relations. In this regard and in response to the recommendations of the direct contacts mission that had taken place from 21 to 27 November 1993, the Department of Manpower had taken some necessary measures, including a series of national seminars on employment and poverty elimination, reviewing labour laws and ways and means of implementing of the Pancasila Industrial Relations system, and on the wage system. Through these seminars, important inputs and views for the review of labour legislation were collected from related government institutions, employers, trade unions, national NGOs, universities as well as experts from other countries and the ILO. The 75th anniversary of the ILO was marked by the signing of the Memorandum of Understanding concerning the five-year programme of cooperation between the Government and the ILO, which showed the Government's full awareness of the importance of ILO technical assistance in improving the national legal system in compliance with international labour standards. Indonesia had always recognized and accepted the universal validity of basic workers' rights not only because it was a Member of the United Nations and the ILO but also because those rights were deeply rooted in the national consciousness and were embodied in the country's state philosophy and Constitution, and in its legislation. The speaker also referred to Ministerial Decrees No. 1 and No. 15A of 1994 noted in the written information submitted to the Committee, and indicated that Ministerial Decree No. 15A restated the non-involvement of the security apparatus in dealing with labour affairs or disputes. The Government was in the process of drafting a comprehensive law on strikes, which would give a clear definition on the involvement of police in the handling of demonstrations to prevent them from engaging themselves in interference in purely labour strikes. The draft law on strikes had been tabled for in-depth study to the national inter-departmental advisory committee. She also noted the Government's efforts to awaken the workers' consciousness of their rights by seriously promoting educational programmes for workers. The Government had encouraged the establishment of trade unions based on industrial sectors in order to achieve better representation and effectiveness and to meet the needs of workers. She considered that the huge number of workers with low levels of education and lack of adequate information could cause ignorance of their basic rights and stressed that, while fundamental workers' rights were indeed universal, their expression and implementation in the national context should remain the competence and responsibility of each government. The speaker noted the recent establishment of two national advisory bodies to deal with issues of fundamental human rights including workers' rights, namely the Independent National Commission on Human Rights and the Inter-departmental Committee on Human Rights. She stated that it had never been a deliberate intention or the policy of the Government to allow violations of the fundamental rights of workers, although full enjoyment of such rights remained elusive due to public ignorance. For this reason, the nationwide promotion of fundamental ILO standards had been set as the priority task of these two institutions. She concluded by confirming her Government's strong commitment to protect and promote workers' right to organize and bargain collectively with their own employers in their respective enterprises and to promote the role of trade unions within the framework of a sound and harmonious industrial relations system at every company.

The Employers' members referred to the direct contacts mission and, in particular, to the recommended measures, which were summarized in the report of the Committee of Experts. They underlined the rather positive results of this mission, and especially that the question was no longer that of principles or of fundamental gaps, but rather the question of improvement and perfection of the situation. In addition, they were pleased with the spirit of cooperation and collaboration with the ILO, which the Government demonstrated during this mission as noted in the report of the Committee of Experts. Besides, they emphasized the different approaches contained in the report and stated that, in their opinion, neither the Committee of Experts nor the Conference Committee should request the adoption of dissuasive sanctions; they should rather call for effective measures that they were able to examine. They concluded by insisting that the Government should clearly indicate the changes in practice and request necessary technical assistance of the ILO.

The Workers' members had the impression that the Government wanted to take steps forward according to the written and oral information it had provided to the Committee. Addressing themselves to the written information, they stated, as a first point, that they did not think five years would be necessary for the preparation of the four legal texts mentioned, especially if the Government benefited from the technical assistance of the ILO; as to the second point, it seemed unacceptable for them that freedom of association and the right to collective bargaining were limited to the enterprise level and that companies with fewer than 25 persons were excluded; besides, a trade union monopoly of the All Indonesia Workers' Union (SPSI) was already installed, even though plural enterprise unions could exist: the question was whether a central union could be freely established; as to points three and four, they referred to the remarks of Workers' members last year and also to the arrests of trade unionists during the previous week, and questioned how the workers were effectively protected in practice against anti-union discrimination and the intervention of the employers; as to point five, they referred to the recommendations of the direct contacts mission and requested the Government to indicate measures taken on the subject and their juridical value; as to point six, the Workers' members wondered who had access to courts and by what means; and finally, as to point seven, as to whether the contents of the new regulation contained more freedom for negotiation. In comparing the reply of the Government and the recommendations of the direct contacts mission, the Workers' members considered that there remained still much to do, even though the supplied information permitted a certain optimism. Since the practice noted was unfortunately rather discouraging, the Committee could not but make conclusions clearly requesting the necessary modifications to legislation, full information on the decisions and changes in practice declared, and hoping that a profound reform would be started and could be noted especially as concerns the recommendations of the direct contacts mission.

The Workers' member of the Netherlands, speaking also on behalf of several Workers' members, including those of Norway and Sweden, stated that the initiative of the Government to invite a direct contacts mission was a clear departure from their position in previous years that this was a minor case. It should be welcomed but the Government should now clearly commit itself to implement the recommendations of the mission and profit from the technical assistance that the ILO could provide. In addition, the situation should be followed, keeping in mind that collective bargaining should be carried out by freely chosen representatives. In this regard, the speaker recalled the situation in Indonesia, where the trade unionists had encountered difficulties in organizing themselves into independent trade union federations such as the SBSI and in expressing themselves; where collective agreements were concluded by the SPSI, a union controlled by the State and which included retired military people in its local and regional bodies; and where the police or armed forces intervened in trade union activities. Despite certain changes in legislation (and regulations) made recently, he thought that interventions were still allowed under other pieces of legislation. In conclusion, he stated that the Committee should request the Government to apply the recommendations of the direct contacts mission in their entirety and to profit from the technical cooperation of the ILO. In this regard, the conclusions of the Committee should fix a time limit – one or two years – for the detailed information to demonstrate progress made in law and practice.

The Workers' member of Japan welcomed the positive tone of the information supplied by the Government and referred to the recommendations of the direct contacts mission, in particular, the suggestion that measures should be taken to avoid to the maximum the intervention of the police and armed forces. He requested the Government's assurance in this regard.

The Government member of the United States expressed the concern that the situation in practice was far more grave than was apparent in the Committee of Experts' observations, and referred to accounts of widespread and extremely serious repression of trade unionists in Indonesia. She noted that her Government was very concerned about the worker rights situation in Indonesia and had strongly urged the Government to invite an ILO direct contacts mission. She welcomed the Government's cooperation and collaboration with the ILO direct contacts mission, as well as the positive remarks made by the Government representative. She encouraged the Government to follow up the recommendations made by the direct contacts mission with the further assistance of the ILO so as to bring the national legislation and practice into conformity with the Convention.

The Workers' member of Indonesia considered that the development of his union (the All Indonesia Workers' Union "SPSI") was now much more satisfactory and encouraging compared with 44 years ago and referred to the Declaration on the unity and integrity of Indonesian workers of 1973, which was the basis of "FBSI" that later became SPSI. He mentioned, in addition to the Ministerial Decrees No. 1 and No. 15A of 1994, Ministerial Decree No. 3 of 1993 on the registration of trade unions. He further stated that the legislation reaffirmed workers' freedom of association without Government and employer interference, and that security forces were prohibited from interfering in the industrial conflict. He also noted that the SPSI had a new structure of "federation" supported by 13 industrial sectors, some of which were affiliated to international sectoral trade unions. In addition he provided some data: the establishment of 11,484 units (compared to 11,000 in March 1993) in the approximately 40,000 companies which had permission to establish trade unions; 8,437 collective bargaining agreements signed (7,000 in March 1993), some of them in the Government-owned plantation enterprises; 2.2 million members who paid the contribution (1.9 million in March 1993). He pointed out that 80 per cent of strikes took place in companies without a trade union and that they usually concerned normative matters such as the minimum wage and the freedom to establish a trade union, while in companies that had SPSI units, demands in strikes were generally above the minimum normative level.

The Workers' member of the United States noted certain information concerning interference: the Indonesian Prosperity Trade Union "SBSI", established in April 1992, reported that the first congress was broken up by soldiers who seized their offices and the premises of the congress; despite the revocation in January 1994 of a 1986 law which allowed employers to use security forces to intervene in labour disputes, the coordinating agency for national stability continued its military intervention in labour disputes whenever it felt "security" was threatened, for example, violent interventions by the military, officers confiscating posters and banners and being ominously present at the negotiations, kidnapping of workers and arrests of trade union leaders, even very recently. He hoped that these actions would finally cease and that the military would withdraw permanently and completely from its involvement in labour matters, as recommended by the Committee of Experts.

The Workers' member of Pakistan referred to the recommendations of the direct contacts mission and emphasized that the Ministerial Decree No. 1 of 1994 should be abrogated. In addition, he supported the view expressed by the Workers' member of the Netherlands regarding collective bargaining.

The Employers' member of Indonesia, after recalling last year's discussion, informed the Committee that the workers and employers had been invited by the Government to participate in strengthening some regulations to ensure a better compliance with the Convention in response to the recommendations of the direct contacts mission, as was indicated by the Government representative. He was pleased with the Government's efforts to respond to the observations made by the Committee of Experts.

Another Government representative emphasized that there had been continuous, consistent and significant development of the condition of labour in his country, at least during the last 25 years, including the right to organize. He stated that the Ministerial Decree No. 1 of 1994 meant that there was no monopoly in the trade unions, and that there could be thousands or even ten thousand unions in the country. In less than four months after the direct contacts mission, the Government had already issued one Ministerial Decree and one Ministerial Regulation, because the elaboration of laws would take a long time. The Government was preparing for the simplification and the consolidation of the whole system with the technical assistance of the ILO. The speaker did not think that there was any contradiction in the two Ministerial decrees, which were consistent in promoting freedom of association and the right to bargain collectively with the respective employers at the plant level. He insisted that there was no trade union monopoly any more, because it was by consensus of all the leaders of workers in the early 1970s that they united themselves into one federation that is FBSI, which became SPSI. Regarding the involvement of security and military forces, he stated that even if there were some retired army personnel who held positions in the SPSI, they did not have any functional relations any more. He pointed out that distinction should be made between the industrial relations issues and the non-industrial relations issues: while the former was always the responsibility of the Ministry of Manpower, the security aspect should be considered in the latter, if there is threat to the national stability or dignity. He also considered that a worker violating laws related to industrial relations issues or something else should not be excused of being brought to court only because he was a worker. He finally confirmed that the efforts to simplify and consolidate the existing provisions would be continued and that progress should be awaited as to the measures for the implementation of the two Decrees.

The Committee took note of the detailed written and oral information provided by the Government representative and the discussion that ensued. The Committee welcomed the fact that a direct contacts mission had been to Indonesia in November 1993 to examine and discuss the measures to be taken to ensure the application of the Convention. Consequently, the Committee expressed the firm hope that this direct contacts mission would be followed by promising developments and that the Government would indicate, in its next detailed report on the application of the Convention, the specific measures effectively taken by the Government to codify and simplify labour legislation ensuring effective protection against anti-trade union discrimination acts and interference and to eliminate legislative restrictions on the right of workers to determine their working conditions through collective bargaining. The Committee hopes that the next report of the Government will indicate decisive progress in the legal and practical application of the Convention, if necessary with the assistance of the International Labour Office.

Malaysia (ratification: 1961). A Government representative stated that the Committee of Experts raised three main issues in its observation this year. He would confine his comments to these three issues, which related to (1) the scope of collective agreements for companies granted "pioneer enterprises" status; (2) internal management prerogatives; and (3) collective bargaining in the public service. Concerning the first issue, the Cabinet had approved the proposed repeal of section 15 of the Industrial Relations Act which limited the scope of collective agreements for so-called "pioneer enterprises", and appropriate action was currently being taken to repeal this Act. The repealing legislation would be transmitted to the ILO as soon as it was passed by Parliament. Regarding the issue of internal management prerogatives, the speaker pointed out that section 13 of the Industrial Relations Act did not confer any advantages on the employers nor did it cause any disadvantages to workers, as the matters covered by that provision were subject to negotiation, conciliation, arbitration and judicial decisions. These matters could be raised at any time as and when necessary as opposed to other matters covered by collective agreements that were negotiated at specific intervals. Finally, regarding the third issue, section 52 of the Industrial Relations Act referred to collective bargaining in the public service. Public sector employees, through their unions, had been holding regular consultations in respect of some aspects of their terms and conditions of employment, including remuneration. The Congress of Unions of Employees in the Public and Civil Services, the offices of the National Joint Councils and the Public Services Department met every month to discuss issues affecting employees in the public services. Through these discussions, the parties were working towards resolving problems by consensus. The National Labour Advisory Council, a tripartite advisory body, at its meeting in April 1994 had taken note of the need for adaptability to changes in the country's economy and the changing social requirements within the framework of an ongoing process. His Government had taken, and continued to take, positive measures to give effect to the Convention.

The Employers' members thanked the Government representative for his explanations, recalling that most of the questions raised by this case were already discussed by the Committee in 1992 and that a direct contacts mission was undertaken in Malaysia in 1993. The observation of the Committee of Experts dealt with three points. Concerning the limits to collective bargaining in so-called "pioneer enterprises", the Government representative confirmed that they would soon be lifted. He would communicate information on when the law would be modified. The exclusion from collective bargaining of issues relating to the power of management had been much discussed in the past by this Committee. The Government had indicated that even these issues could be negotiated and that there existed regulatory procedures for these types of conflicts. The question of the existence of a proper power of management had nevertheless been raised, and the Employers believed that, in certain areas, the final decision was theirs and could not be shared. But there was no need to attempt to exclude these areas from collective bargaining by law. Concerning restrictions to the right of collective bargaining in the public administration, the Government stated that they were in part compensated by the fact that joint councils of Government and worker representatives met several times per year. It was important to recall that it was voluntary collective bargaining that the Convention was asking for, through the appropriate measures given national conditions. Dialogue must be interpreted as a first step in this sense and it should lead to greater progress. Generally, the Government must be encouraged to progress by the proper avenues and report on all changes that take place.

The Workers' members thanked the Government representative for his explanations before this Committee. The points raised by the Committee of Experts were now sufficiently well known by this Committee so that there was no need to go into detail. It was nevertheless useful to recall that in 1992, this Committee had criticized legislation which allowed unacceptable interference in collective bargaining. The Committee of Experts pointed out this year that the Government was seriously envisaging the repeal of section 15 of the Industrial Relations Act, and the Government representative also indicated that decisions to this end had been taken. It was to be hoped that this was the first sign of a more positive attitude from the Government with regard to standards. It was regrettable that no progress had been made concerning two other issues. The Government representative, who invoked the need to take account of the requirements of economic development, was requested to refer to paragraph 21 of the General Report of the Committee of Experts which underlined that the respect of standards of fundamental human rights must be observed regardless of economic circumstances or fluctuations. This Committee should associate itself with the request of the Committee of Experts for further information. It was appropriate to insist that the Government inform the Office of the measures that it envisaged taking in order to protect workers against acts of interference and discrimination.

The Employers' member of Malaysia asserted that the exclusion by section 13(3) of the Industrial Relations Act of matters relating to an employee's promotion, transfer, termination, dismissal or allocation of duties (management prerogatives) was not in contravention of the Convention. He underlined that section 13(3) did not grant unfettered rights to employers, as demonstrated by numerous decisions of Malaysian courts on this matter. For example, an employer could refuse to promote an employee only for proper cause and any trade union was free under the law to raise questions as to what was or was not proper cause. Moreover, the employers' prerogative of transfer was not unlimited and the courts had ruled that there should be no unreasonableness or want of bona fide on the part of the employer. Termination by way of retrenchment could not be carried out arbitrarily and the "last in, first out" principle had to be applied. Unjust dismissal could entitle the worker to reinstatement. All the above proved that employers were not free to exercise their prerogatives in an unlimited fashion. Therefore, section 13(3) did not impose any limitations and therefore was in line with the Convention. He took exception to the Experts' view that section 13(3) constituted "limitations" to the Convention. He welcomed the Experts' view on the very same issue in paragraph 250 of their 1994 General Survey on freedom of association for holding "tripartite discussions, for the preparation on a voluntary basis of guidelines for collective bargaining", instead of doing away with section 13(3). Moreover, nothing in Convention No. 98 provided for an unfettered right for unions to bargain for their members. To provide that matters such as promotion or transfer or allocation of duties should be covered by a collective agreement would amount to asserting that it was not the management which was responsible for managing the enterprise, which would indeed be contrary to commonly accepted practice worldwide.

The Government member of Indonesia considered that the Government of Malaysia had taken significant steps and achieved progress in this case. First, the Malaysian Government had approved the proposed repeal of section 15 of the Industrial Relations Act which limited the scope of collective agreements for so-called "pioneer enterprises". Moreover, there had been periodical meetings of the tripartite partners in the public sector. It was only a matter of time before the role of the Congress of Unions of Employees in the Public Sector would progress significantly.

The Workers' member of Pakistan wished to draw the attention of the Government representative to the observation of the Committee of Experts in paragraph 2 relating to section 13, subsection 3, which limited the right of collective bargaining on questions of promotion, transfer, employment, termination, dismissal and reinstatement. He disagreed with what the Government representative had asserted, that these questions were not subject to collective bargaining and were instead dealt with by judicial decisions. He disagreed because in his view Article 1 of Convention No. 98 required that workers should enjoy protection against anti-union activities. With respect to collective bargaining rights of public servants not engaged in the administration of the State, the speaker said that the Convention expressly required they had the right to negotiate and the right to collective bargaining. He recalled that the Committee of Experts had emphasized in its General Survey that it was essential that these workers take full part in collective bargaining and should have access to all financial, budgetary and other data enabling them to assess the situation. It did not suffice to say like the Government representative did that there was always consensus in general on these questions. One had to provide for collective bargaining to resolve cases of differences between workers and employers that might eventually arise. He urged the Government to review its legislation in the light of the observation made by the Committee of Experts, and particularly to amend section 15 of the Industrial Relations Act.

The Workers' member of Japan noted the positive tone of the statement made by the Government representative but felt uneasy given the support given by the Employers' member from Malaysia and the Government member of Indonesia, a country which had a very similar outlook regarding the observation of the Committee of Experts. He joined the Workers' members in expressing the hope that real and concrete progress would be made and that the Committee of Experts would then be able to further examine the case.

The Government representative reiterated that positive steps were being taken to bring changes to Malaysian legislation. In so far as the repeal of section 15 of the Industrial Relations Act was concerned, this would be discussed by Parliament in December 1994. Regarding the other two provisions, the National Labour Advisory Council was considering the matter and it was hoped that this Committee would come up with a suggestion as to how the law was to be reviewed in the not so distant future.

The speaker added that although all developing countries considered investment and development needs to be high priority issues, this did not mean sacrificing the interests of labour. Labour played a very important role in the Government's efforts to meet development and investment targets and would continue to do so under the guidance of responsible union leaders. Three major trade union centrals in the country were participating in the National Labour Advisory Council and it was hoped that, through these tripartite discussions with the employers, concrete progress would be made in the near future.

The Workers' members noted that the Government representative was trying to demonstrate that section 13(3) did not raise any problems in practice. If that was the case, it was up to the Government to prove it by furnishing the information requested by the Committee of Experts.

The Committee took note of the statement made by the Government representative and the discussion which followed. The Committee emphasized the fact that, for several years, the Committee of Experts had been making comments on restrictions on the scope of collective bargaining which resulted from the law and restrictions on the rights of employees in the public service to bargain collectively. The Committee, like the Committee of Experts, noted the explanations provided by the Government according to which the provisions referring to collective bargaining in pioneer enterprises were being repealed. It also noted that, in the private sector, matters excluded under the law from collective bargaining were in practice the subject of negotiation. It finally noted that, in the public service, joint committees examined the problems of application of the remuneration machinery recently set up. The Committee expressed the firm hope that restrictions on the scope of collective bargaining contained in the law would be repealed in the near future in order to bring the law into conformity with practice in the private sector, and that the Government would make every effort to encourage and promote voluntary negotiation of working conditions and remuneration of employees in the public service covered by the Convention. The Committee requested the Government to submit a detailed report to the Committee of Experts to allow it to assess to what extent real progress had been made in law and in practice in these areas.

Morocco (ratification: 1957). A Government representative stated that his Government attached great importance to the right to organize and collective bargaining, which was reflected in the legislation as well as in practice. At the level of the legislation, there were two important laws – the law of 16 July 1957 respecting occupational organizations and the law of 17 April 1957 on the collective bargaining – which formed the basis for the collective bargaining. Besides the ratification of Convention No. 98, the procedure for the ratification of Convention No. 154 on collective bargaining was presently in its final stage as the Government had already given its accord in principle. On the practical level, collective agreements were concluded both in certain industrial sectors and in individual enterprises; to increase their number and to facilitate the dialogue between the social partners, a model of a typical collective agreement had been elaborated in collaboration with occupational organizations. He considered that the promotion of the law through negotiations was a solution for the future for the stability of industrial relations and for finding practical solutions to the existing problems. With respect to the comments made by certain Moroccan trade unions, like the CDT and the UGTM, concerning the absence of texts protecting the workers against acts of anti-union discrimination, the Decree of 23 October 1948 provided that the employer could hire workers only on the basis of their qualification and aptitude, any other criteria being illegal, including membership in a trade union; the law of 17 July 1957 proclaimed freedom of association and the right to form trade unions freely to defend professional interests of their members, any encroachment on this liberty being punishable. He emphasized that it was for the complaining party to take the case to the tribunal and that the tribunals had in fact taken decisions in these cases. The Tribunal of the First Instance of Rabat, for example, having determined that the real motive for dismissing certain workers was their exercise of trade union activities, ordered these workers to be reintegrated in their employment. In addition, the Court of Appeal of Rabat, in its decision of 1 October 1984, considered that dismissal for trade union activity was abusive and could give grounds for compensation. As these sanctions were sufficiently dissuasive, it did not seem necessary to provide for penal sanctions, all the more so as Convention No. 98 did not require it. However, to conform to the opinion of the Committee of Experts, more precise provisions accompanied by penal sanctions were included in the draft Labour Code. The adoption of this Code was however delayed at the request of the occupational organizations which wanted to improve it, but considering the measures taken lately, it was highly possible that the Code would be adopted or submitted for adoption before the end of the year. Concerning the complaints considered by the Committee on Freedom of Association, mentioned in the report, he stated that the number of complaints should not prejudge the application of Convention No. 98 and that, on the contrary, the existence of such complaints demonstrated that the interested parties were free to express themselves without any fear of repressive measures. The Government had already responded to these complaints and considered that the complainants should first of all exhaust all internal procedures before the ordinary tribunals to contest the employers' decisions as well as taking action before the administrative tribunals to cancel the administrative acts. Concerning the information on the settlement of collective labour disputes, the representative pointed out that, generally, the procedure for their settlement was contained in the collective agreements concluded between trade unions and employers. The law of 1946 on the conciliation and arbitration which prohibited the use of strikes until the conciliation procedures were exhausted was no longer applied, as a result of the position taken by the trade unions which considered this law to be incompatible with the principle of the right to strike guaranteed by the Constitution; a new draft law had been elaborated and communicated to occupational organizations for comments. In the preceding month a high-level social dialogue had taken place between the Government and the social partners, with very positive results. A written and more detailed report would be communicated as soon as possible.

The Workers' members stated that it was a well-known case for the Committee on Freedom of Association as well as for this Committee, which had already discussed the matter in 1988. They noted with satisfaction the intention of the Government to ratify Convention No. 154, as well as that of taking into account the comments made by the experts. They recalled that the Committee of Experts had for many years made observations and criticisms concerning the acts of anti-union discrimination and interference contrary to provisions of Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention, and that many trade unions, like the CDT and the UGTM, had to resubmit their complaints and observations denouncing the poor functioning of the collective bargaining procedures as a means of determining the conditions of work. For many years the Government had only repeated that a draft Labour Code was in the course of elaboration, yet this Code had still not been adopted and in the meantime there were many acts of anti-union discrimination. Moreover, collective bargaining had until now remained a theoretical concept and apparently did not have much practical impact. They were even obliged to note that a number of questions persisted concerning the quality of information supplied by the Government. The Committee on Freedom of Association was obliged to deal with numerous complaints without having received the comments and information from the Government. In order to demonstrate its real intention, the Government should adopt the necessary provisions in order to resolve the problems mentioned and provide the information required so that they could be examined in time by the Committee of Experts. They suggested that the Government could request the technical assistance of the Office, but considered that a direct contacts mission would be a more appropriate means of action. It was important to indicate in the conclusions that real progress must be registered next year.

The Employers' members recalled that this case was last discussed in this Committee in 1987 and 1988 and that, with respect to the absence of legislation guaranteeing protection against anti-union discrimination, the Government representative was saying essentially the same things that he said in 1987. Already in 1987 the Government announced that it was about to issue the draft Labour Code which had been prepared with the assistance of the Office. Today it stated that there were new delays in the adoption of this legislation at the request of the participants in this process who wanted to make changes in substance. The Employers' members wondered whether this text was still consistent with the requirements of the Convention after an interval of seven years. The Employers' members supported the suggestion made by the Workers' members for a direct contacts mission to review the present state of the legislation. Given the fundamental nature of protecting workers' organizations from interference, they considered that the Government should enact legislation and fully implement it in practice as a matter of urgency. As to whether or not there was a viable system of collective bargaining in Morocco, the Employers' members noted that negotiations took place through special commissions that included the social partners. However, the Committee of Experts had made a series of requests to the Government for information to clarify the situation, and the Employers' members urged the Government to honour its commitment to provide the information as soon as possible. It was only after the Committee of Experts had reviewed the situation that the Employers' members would be in a position to evaluate whether or not the Government was fully meeting its obligations under the Convention.

The Workers' member of Morocco stated that while the Government of Morocco had ratified the Convention in 1957, no consistent policy was applied in the field of collective bargaining; only ten collective agreements had been concluded since the 1960s; and even the collective agreements signed by the Government were violated, as it was the case in the sugar production sector. The law on collective agreements was not applied, as for example in the banking sector, and when the Government was organizing what its representative has called "dialogues" with the social partners, the result was meaningless and formal sittings giving an illusion of dialogue. Concerning the violations of the rights of trade unions, the acts of anti-union discrimination and interference, he regretted that a Convention of such importance as Convention No. 87 has not been ratified. The law of 16 July 1957 respecting occupational organizations did not provide for the protection of trade union delegates and of trade unions which resulted in practice in violations in the form of dismissals, imprisonments and legal prosecution of trade union activists. In the course of 1993 alone, 96 trade unionists of the Moroccan Union of Labour (UMT) had been arrested or prosecuted, including a good number of militant women, and several dozen militants were dismissed for their trade union activities. The decisions on the reintegration of the dismissed activists given by the tribunals were not applied. This was why several complaints had been made by the UMT to the Committee on Freedom of Association; the examination of the complaints before the Committee on Freedom of Association had been postponed many times because of the lack of information from the Government. There was also another and more dangerous form of violation of the right to organize: the Government, in the name of trade union pluralism, was creating various trade union organizations, directly and indirectly, through the intermediary of political parties with the aim of weakening the free, authentic and independent trade unions organized by the workers and for the benefit of the workers. This was in flagrant contradiction with the resolution of 1952 concerning the independence of the trade union movement. Concerning the draft Labour Code and the draft law on arbitration and conciliation, he indicated that there were divergent points of view because those drafts did not constitute a veritable social advance, being in fact a simple compilation of the old texts with an objective of encroaching on the social achievements and in particular on the right to strike. The Committee should invite the Government of Morocco to respect the Convention and the right to organize.

The Government representative recalled that the acts of discrimination came within the competence of the tribunals, and that the interested parties should bring their cases before those bodies. As to the poor functioning of collective bargaining, it was a question which concerned exclusively the trade unions and the employers, because the Government did not interfere in this field. The draft Labour Code had been amended and contained very important provisions which would make possible the ratification of other Conventions. In the pluralistic system in Morocco, there existed at present seven central trade union organizations and the Workers' member who had spoken previously might not represent the general opinion of all trade unions.

The Committee noted the oral information communicated by the Government representative as well as the discussion which took place. The Committee observed with concern that, despite the assurances given on a number of occasions by the Government to adopt a draft Labour Code in the near future and to bring the legislation into conformity with the Convention, no tangible progress has been noted. The Committee noted that, in the course of the examination of numerous complaints concerning acts of anti-union discrimination, the Committee on Freedom of Association had recommended the Government to ensure effective protection against acts of anti-union discrimination by means of specific provisions. The Committee also noted that the Committee of Experts had made observations on this question as well as on the protection against acts of interference and the poor functioning of the machinery of collective bargaining for the purpose of determining conditions of employment. Recalling the importance it attaches to the implementation of this fundamental Convention, the Committee once again called on the Government to provide, as of next year, a detailed report to be examined by the Committee of Experts in order to permit an evaluation of the extent to which real progress has been made in law and in practice. The Committee recalled that the International Labour Office was at the Government's disposal to provide any technical assistance that might be necessary in the form of direct contacts or any other form.

Singapore (ratification: 1965). The Government supplied the following information:

The Annual Wage Supplement (AWS) payment is peculiar to Singapore. It began as a form of goodwill payment given by employers to their employees during the year and festival seasons. This was particularly so when companies were profitable. This payment later became a contentious industrial relations issue in collective bargaining. While the unions sought to raise the quantum of this payment, employers wanted it to be discontinued. As a compromise, employers and unions agreed that the payment of AWS should be limited to one month's salary and setting a legislative limit would help to solve the disputes on this issue. As there is no restriction in collective bargaining in respect of negotiation on wage increases, bonus payments and other forms of reward for workers, the legislative limit on the quantum of AWS to resolve an industrial relations problem peculiar to Singapore should not be viewed as an imposed restriction on collective bargaining. It should be seen as a "social contract" between the employers and trade unions, with the support of government to resolve a contentious issue in industrial relations for the benefit of all. To remove the legislative limit would seriously undermine this "social contract" and bring forth the contentious issue which has been painfully overcome through tripartite consultations and consensus. Hence, the Government hopes that the Committee of Experts could look at this legislative limit from the historical perspective and give due regard to the need to help balance the interests of both employers and unions/workers through legislation to solve this peculiar problem. As far as rewards for workers are concerned, either in the form of wage increases or bonus payments, there is no restriction in the system of collective bargaining.

In relation to section 25 of the Industrial Relations Act, we would also like to confirm that the Industrial Arbitration Court has, as in previous years, not refused to certify any of the collective agreements which contained terms and conditions of service more favourable than Part IV of the Employment Act.

Sudan (ratification: 1957). A Government representative first of all stated that in his country freedom of association was guaranteed by section 16.1 of the Trade Union Act of 1992. This Act prohibited that a request to join or to leave a trade union be refused. Joining and leaving a trade union were finalized immediately upon request. This section must be read together with section 13 of the Manpower Act, which provided for the registration of candidates for posts. There were no constraints in that Act to membership or non-membership of a trade union. Section 9 of the same Act also stipulated that an unemployed person with the capacity and desire to work could register with the employment service concerned upon presentation of the necessary documentation. Secondly, section 13(b) stipulated that any enterprise employing ten or more persons that wished to employ a person covered by this Act could request to the corresponding employment service to recruit a person qualified for that job. With regard to the question of stability of employment and the prevention of discrimination with regard to workers and their trade union organizations, section 3, subsection 2 of the Act of 1992 prohibited the employer from disciplining any member of a trade union because of that person's trade union activities. Thirdly, with regard to the protection of trade union organizations, section 24 of the Trade Union Act of 1992 stipulated that the employer could not impose any financial or other penalties or sanctions in order to make a person join or leave a trade union organization, and the employer could not interfere in the internal affairs of trade union organizations. Fourthly, with regard to the necessity of adopting measures in order to promote collective bargaining negotiations, section 11 of the Industrial Relations Act of 1976 provided that in the case of a labour dispute, the two parties to the dispute were required, within a period of two weeks, to launch negotiations in order to reach a voluntary settlement to the dispute within three weeks from the start of such negotiations. He concluded by insisting on the importance his Government attached to the dialogue with this Committee and expressed its readiness to cooperate with it and with the Committee of Experts in order to serve the objectives of this Organization.

The Workers' members pointed out that although the brevity of the observation of the Committee of Experts on this case might be interpreted to obscure the very serious character of the violations of Convention No. 98 involved in this case, nothing could be further from the truth. They recalled that the experts' observation was not based upon a report from the Government, but on the conclusion of the Committee on Freedom of Association in Case No. 1508, adopted in November 1992. The comments of the Committee of Experts on this case suggested that there had been a violent and almost total elimination of trade union rights in Sudan. For a better understanding of this case, they considered it was necessary to look at the facts and the conclusions of the Committee on Freedom of Association in Case No. 1508 on which the Committee of Experts relied in reaching its conclusions. This revealed that the complaint was filed in October 1989 with the Committee on Freedom of Association by the WFTU, the ICFTU and the International Federation of Commercial, Clerical, Professional and Technical Employees alleging severe repression of trade union activities following the June 1989 coup d'état including the dissolution of all trade union organizations in the country, the detention of numerous trade union leaders, the confiscation of union assets and property by the military and the sentencing to death of a trade union leader for calling a doctors' strike. The Committee on Freedom of Association concluded that there was, first, a denial by the new Trade Union Act of trade union rights to certain public servants; second, the imposition of a system of trade union monopoly imposed by legislation; third, government interference in union activities and elections; fourth, suspension or dissolution of trade union organizations by administrative authorities; and finally, lack of sufficient protection afforded to workers against acts of anti-union discrimination. In view of the seriously troubling aspects of this case, they wished to ask the Government representative to inform them about any corrective measures taken or contemplated to amend the new Trade Union Act and thus ensure workers' rights under the Convention. Thus far, what they had heard from the Government representative was really a restatement of the current law and not a response to the comments of the Committee of Experts and the Committee on Freedom of Association.

The Employers' members noted that up until now this Committee had not dealt with Sudan under Convention No. 98. They recalled however that in the last few years it had repeatedly dealt with this country on other subjects, such as under Convention No. 29, on forced labour where considerable problems were encountered and clear violations noted. This year it was certainly timely to deal with this country under Convention No. 98, the application of which posed serious problems. The statement of the Government representative did not in any way respond to the points raised by the Committee of Experts regarding the non-compliance, in law and practice, by Sudan with fundamental principles of freedom of association. They fully supported the views of the Workers' members and felt that if no concrete replies were not provided by the Government, at least in its next report, this Committee should reserve its right to come back to it next year in order to see whether important changes had occurred.

The Workers' member of New Zealand noted that the experts' comments on this case were brief but absolutely unequivocal. These comments recorded the conclusions of the Committee on Freedom of Association which expressed concern at the numerous and serious incompatibilities of the 1990 Trade Union Act with the principles of freedom of association, and in particular the lack of protection afforded to workers against acts of anti-union discrimination. Since the introduction of the new Act and the issuing of the report of the Committee on Freedom of Association, it appeared that the events in Sudan over the past 18 months had in fact confirmed the worst fears expressed concerning the likely impact of the Act. Moreover, the Government had interfered in trade union activities and trade unionists had been arrested, detained, tortured and forced into exile. The speaker was heartened by the statement of the Government representative when he said that his Government wanted to work very closely with this Committee and with the Committee on Freedom of Association to fulfil the requirements of the Convention. She felt, however, that if any practical change were to occur, then this Committee needed to express its views in the strongest possible terms.

The Workers' member of Togo emphasized that the violation of trade union rights constituted a violation of human rights. The situation in Sudan preoccupied independent African organizations which worried that these violations could spread and threaten the whole system of standards.

The Workers' member of Sudan spoke as Secretary-General of the Sudanese Confederation of Trade Unions and thanked the Government representative for his explanations before describing the trade union situation in his country. The merging of all of the sectoral and various levels of unions decided upon by the Trade Union Conference of 1990 was in response to a more general objective of efficiency and independence as regards political parties. The law counted for less than the power of the trade union movement: it was thanks to the power of its conviction that the movement obtained the modification of the minimum wage from the Government. This Committee, in its work of defence of social justice, should avoid to treat developing countries in the same manner as industrialized countries. Those countries need technical assistance to provide them a fair base.

The Workers' member of Germany, reacting to the Workers' member of Sudan, considered that a situation of imposed trade union monopoly did not indicate a great respect of the right to organize, which necessarily involved the free choice of union affiliation. When the law provided for a single trade union, neither trade union independence nor freedom of association was respected. This Committee should clearly point out that this was a grave violation of human rights.

The Workers' member of Sudan, in response to the Workers' member of Germany, stated that the trade union unity in his country had not been imposed by law but had been decided upon spontaneously by elected representatives.

The Workers' member of Greece, reacting to the Workers' member of Sudan, stated that it was not useful to come to help the Government representative in the elements not reflecting the reality. The real trade union situation in Sudan had been explained to the Workers' group by a Sudanese trade unionist in exile, which was characterized by the absence of freedom of expression and of freedom of association. It was not by prohibiting workers from freely explaining themselves that a country hoped to progress in its development.

Another Government representative of Sudan replied that the National Salvation Revolution did not dissolve the trade unions, but only re-examined political and social organizations and setups. With regard to trade unions and the revision of their structure, it should be noted that they were suspended for a period of only two months, after which they resumed their activities in full freedom. They held a large conference in 1990 in the course of which the workers laid down a new strategy for trade union activities to allow workers to enjoy their trade union rights. This dialogue gave birth to a tripartite committee which drew up draft trade union legislation endorsed by the competent authorities. He considered that the views expressed in this Committee were not pertinent to the question of whether his Government was applying Convention No. 98. In his view this was being done satisfactorily regarding discrimination and the right to collective bargaining. With respect to the violations raised in the Committee on Freedom of Association they said the Government had provided that Committee in 1993 with a detailed reply containing explanations on the provisions of the law. The Committee had not yet considered or examined this reply. In his view therefore the dialogue was continuing. He further wished to add that in Sudan they did not have detainees at present and that if anyone was interested to ascertain this he would be most welcome to do so.

The Employers' members considered that the discussion had shown that their proposals to have a complete report on all the individual points raised were urgently required in order to permit the re-examination of the situation in Sudan as soon as possible.

The Workers' members supported the views expressed by the Employers' members that this case needed to be examined again next year. They emphasized the gravity of the situation and expressed the hope that that would be reflected in the conclusions of this Committee in view of the fact that one of the allegations included the death and torture of a trade union leader. Were it not for the fact that it was being discussed for the first time they would certainly have requested that it be put in a Special Paragraph.

The Government representative of Sudan reiterated the fact that the issue under discussion was pending before the Committee on Freedom of Association which Committee had been provided with a report. The issue regarding the death of a trade unionist was raised within the said Committee and a reply provided. He said he would convey the observations of this Committee to his Government.

The Committee took note of the statement made by the Government representative and the discussion that took place in the Committee. The Committee would like to remind the Government of the need to make in-depth modifications in its national legislation and practice to ensure the application of the Convention. The Committee noted with concern several complaints had been submitted to the Committee on Freedom of Association concerning, in particular, serious acts of anti-trade union discrimination. The Committee would reiterate the importance that it attached to the interdependence that existed between civil rights and freedom of association, and it could not overemphasize the fact that the guarantees stipulated in the Convention could not be effective unless they were truly recognized and protected as part of civil and political freedoms. The Committee expressed the firm hope that the Government would, as of next year, submit a detailed report to the Committee of Experts on the measures taken or under consideration to ensure that workers and their organizations had true protection against acts of anti-trade union discrimination and against acts of interference, as well as to promote voluntary negotiation of collective bargaining agreements, with a view to regulating employment conditions between employers and workers in Sudan.

Turkey (ratification: 1952). A Government representative of Turkey declared that he would offer information on the three points concerning the application of Convention No. 98 raised in the report of the Committee of Experts: (1) numerical requirements concerning the determination of the representativity of a trade union for collective negotiation; (2) trade union rights of civil servants; and (3) compulsory arbitration in relation to the suspension of a strike. Concerning the first point, the speaker recalled having given information last year on Article 12 of Law No. 2822 on Collective Labour Agreements, Strikes, and Lock-outs. This had not been modified because the most representative social partners wished to maintain the existing system, and the Government was not able to undertake the legislative modifications requested by the Committee of Experts. He added that there was now a proposal of the Ministry of Labour and Social Security to remove the 10 per cent numerical restriction so that the trade union could participate in collective bargaining of any given branch, and this had been communicated to the social partners. The Confederation of Workers, TURK-IS, has declared itself against this proposal by a letter of 5 April 1994. The Confederation of Employers, TISK, equally declared itself against the proposal by a letter of 19 April 1994. Nevertheless, the Ministry is continuing its work to modify this Law and the law on trade unions. Concerning the second point (trade union rights of civil servants), the speaker recalled indicating last year that new legislation would be drafted in conformity with Conventions Nos. 87 and 151 which have recently been ratified by Turkey. He reported that there has now been a proposal of a law on trade union rights for civil servants and their participation, by the intermediary of their representatives, in the determination of their conditions of work. This proposal has been approved by the Council of Ministers, and it has been submitted to the National Assembly and transmitted for study to the Parliament. He added that, in practice, civil servants have already started to form trade unions, and that by a Circular of the Prime Minister, No. 1993/15 of 15 June 1993, the hesitations of certain administrative authorities have been removed, and the civil servants can freely constitute trade unions. Concerning the third point (compulsory arbitration in relation to the suspension of a strike), the speaker pointed out that if the Committee of Experts request a modification of Article 33 of Law No. 2822 on Collective Labour Agreements, Strikes and Lock-outs, he believed nevertheless that compulsory arbitration should be applied to essential services the interruption of which may put in danger all or a part of the population, life, security or health. The speaker added that the contents of this Article are not in contradiction with the principles held by the Committee of Experts because they permit the Government to impose compulsory arbitration only if the strike is of a nature such as referred to above. He underlined, however, that any decision of the Government in this affair could at any moment be submitted to independent judicial procedures or submitted to private arbitration. Finally, he pointed out that the Government could always rethink or annul its decision if circumstances justify a cessation, the interested parties still having the possibility to reach an agreement at this stage. The conflict would be submitted to compulsory arbitration of the Supreme Committee of Arbitration only if there is no solution. In any event, the Government will not call a suspension to a strike except in exceptional circumstances, and they have not resorted to this procedure in the last year. To conclude, the speaker announced the adoption by the National Assembly of a law authorizing the Government to ratify Convention No. 158 (Termination of Employment, 1982). This will hold particular importance for the right to organize and trade union activity.

The Workers' members pointed out that this case had been discussed several times and that the Committee of Experts had formulated observations on the matter. These observations were restated in its last report under the three points put forward below and upon which the Government representative based his intervention: the numerical requirements of 10 per cent of the workers in a branch and more than half of the workers of the establishment was required of the trade union to obtain the power for collective bargaining; the refusal to allow civil servants the right for collective bargaining; and compulsory arbitration in work conflicts which affected essential services. They noted with interest the ratification of Conventions Nos. 87, 135 and 151 and welcomed the announcement of the future ratification of Convention No. 158. Nevertheless, they had the impression that many of the measures announced by the governmental representative and the ambiguous nature of the statements made by the Government representative led them to believe that the Government would continue to control the trade union movement and the development of collective bargaining. Returning to the question of numerical requirements, they supported the statements made in the General Survey (paragraph 97 and following, and paragraph 238 and following) concerning the importance of an equilibrium between trade union pluralism and efficiency in collective bargaining. They equally agreed with the considerations developed in paragraph 241 of the same study in which the Committee of Experts dealt with the recognition of trade unions leading to collective bargaining, and considered that such a system could lead to the exclusion from negotiations of a union which, while having a majority, did not constitute 50 per cent of members. Considering that a national system must promote the efficiency of collective bargaining and stimulate social dialogue, they believe that the system foreseen by the Turkish legislation did not respond to this need because of the double criteria concerning the amount of workers represented. This double criteria allowed the exclusion of a large number of workers from all collective bargaining. Concerning the right to negotiation for workers in the civil service, the Workers' members supported the opinion expressed by the Committee of Experts in paragraph 105 of its General Study and considered that freedom of association could not be denied to civil servants or to public employees. This sector must be allowed a significant role in matters of collective bargaining (paragraph 265). They felt that the concept of a civil servant must be understood in a strict sense. Concerning compulsory arbitration, they recalled that the Committee of Experts only allowed this procedure in cases of essential services. They requested the Government representative to give explanations as to the system of compulsory arbitration prescribed in free trade zones. To conclude, the Workers' members requested the Government to follow the proposals of the Committee of Experts in eliminating both numerical requirements as well as the requirement for compulsory arbitration and to adopt the law on trade union rights for civil servants. They expressed their hope that the Government would take the necessary measures for stimulating free collective bargaining at all levels and in all enterprises.

The Employers' members first dealt with the question of numerical requirements used to determine the representativity of an organization within the framework of collective bargaining. The Committee of Experts criticized the double criteria of 10 and 50 per cent as being too high, and the Employers agreed. The Government also appeared to agree, as it had not expressed a divergent opinion. The Employers' members understood, however, the difficulty the Government had in modifying the regulations in question since the social partners seemed to want to maintain the system as it was and both had rejected the proposed change in the law. Nevertheless they called on the Government to do everything possible to submit a new law to Parliament understanding that the question could only be resolved by modification of the pertinent regulations. Secondly, the Employers' members could not express an opinion concerning the right of negotiation for civil servants, since, according to the information communicated by the Government, the Parliament was now studying a proposed law which would abolish or at least limit the restrictions imposed on civil servants. The new law would allow civil servants the right to negotiate collectively. In any event, it seemed that, according to the Committee of Experts, the TURK-IS was not satisfied and that the restrictions persist. The Committee of Experts had expressed the hope that the proposed law would guarantee to public civil servants the right to bargain collectively and that the Government would provide information on any new changes. For their part, the Employers' members hoped that these changes would be undertaken and followed, and they hoped to be kept informed of the progress realized. Third, the Employers' members dealt with the question of compulsory arbitration. They referred to the formula utilized by the Committee of Experts according to which it should not be used except in the case of certain essential services in the strict sense of the term. That is to say, compulsory arbitration would be used only in cases where there was a threat to public health, public security or the lives of the population. The Employers' members considered, as they had said several times, that this formula went too far and that the State must have the possibility to intervene before such a grave situation occurs. The Government has said that it would only use compulsory arbitration when public health, security or lives were in peril. Furthermore, it stated that an appeal to the courts could be lodged against the decision to interrupt a strike for 60 days, and all sides participate in the subsequent arbitration. Finally, there are no indications that this kind of arbitration is often used or that it is used in an abusive manner. They considered that a procedure was significant only when one appreciated its application in practice. It should be recalled that compulsory arbitration would come into play only after a delay of 60 days had been allowed for the partners to reach an agreement. In addition, there was the possibility to appeal within the judicial system and to constitute a tripartite arbitration tribunal. The Committee of Experts had not signalled an abuse of this procedure, and in these circumstances, the Employers' members felt that they must ask the Government to follow up the measures that they had begun with a view to modifying the regulations concerning numerical requirements and to facilitate the participation of civil servants in collective bargaining. To conclude, they were reassured by the fact that the Government had ratified Convention No. 87 last year.

The Workers' member of Norway declared that he would be speaking for the Workers' members of Denmark, Finland, Iceland, Sweden and the Netherlands. He deplored the fact that the Turkish Government continued to oppose pluralism in the structures of trade union activity. Examination of the consequences of the prescribed numerical requirements for judging the representativity of an organization for collective bargaining purposes, led to the conclusion that the Government wished to crush the leftist trade unions. This applied in particular to DISK, a trade union which the Government should be proud of because it had been noteworthy for its contributions to the political process leading to democracy. He considered it wrong for the Government to state that another Turkish trade union did not accept the interpretation of the Committee of Experts. He underlined the fact that the right of civil servants to take part in collective bargaining had still not been recognized. This was in spite of the fact that the Government had assured the Conference Committee on several occasions that laws contrary to fundamental human rights would be repealed quickly after the adoption of the Constitution of 1980 and after a conference held in March 1994 in Istanbul. Participants to this conference included the European Union, the Council of Europe, trade union leaders of TURK-IS, of HAK-IS and of DISK and the international centres ICFTU and the ECTU. The Government affirmed that the measures necessary for ensuring that national legislation conformed to the Conventions of the ILO, and notably Convention No. 98, would be taken. The Government also referred to its request to become a Member of the European Union which would guarantee the consecration of fundamental rights into its national legislation. In his opinion, the proposal for a law which had been presented envisaged the assimilation of organizations of civil servants to associations and not trade unions, thus implying that the State would exercise control over these organizations according to civil law.

The Workers' member of Turkey regretted that the Government had continued to violate the provisions of the Convention. Existing legislation fixed fines for acts of anti-union discrimination at 30-130 US cents, which was ridiculously low. Legislation also required trade unions to inform the Government of newly recruited members within 15 days and the Ministry of Labour used its authority to issue certificates of competence as a means of interfering with trade unions. Trade union officers and employees could be dismissed without just cause, and employers could oppose their reinstatement. The speaker emphasized the need for a total revision of labour law in Turkey, in line with Conventions Nos. 87, 98 and 151, and for this, technical assistance should be requested from the ILO. The speaker cited several examples in which public servants were prevented from organizing. The draft legislation referred to by the Government as a positive step in this regard would not solve the problems and, in certain cases, might even aggravate them. In one case, a trade union of civilian employees in military establishments, legally formed under existing legislation, would be dissolved under the proposed bill. There was little room for collective bargaining in the legislation. In case of a dispute, the proposed legislation establishes a conciliation committee, made up of two government officials and a university staff member, which proposes a solution. The Council of Ministers has power to decide whether a strike will be allowed and when and where it will take place. There is extensive use of compulsory arbitration in Turkey. Strikes are banned in a great number of non-essential sectors. Even where collective bargaining is allowed, it is to be completed in a period of 60 days; and if not, compulsory mediation determines the matter. Pursuant to the Free Trade Zone Act, there is compulsory arbitration for a period of ten years following the establishment of the zone. These are clear violations of Convention No. 98. The proposed amendments to the Collective Labour Agreements, Strikes and Lock-outs Act will not bring the legislation into line with the Convention. And neither will the Democratization Plan of the Government. The speaker concluded by reiterating that all Turkish labour legislation needed to be harmonized with Conventions Nos. 87, 98 and 151 as well as recommendations and proposals of the Committee of Experts, the Committee on Freedom of Association and this Conference Committee. This should be done with technical assistance from the Office and the participation of the social partners.

The Employers' member of Romania considered that, instead of criticizing the Government of Turkey, the Conference Committee should congratulate it on its efforts in complying with Convention No. 98. Concerning the problem of numerical requirements, the speaker wished to know if there exist internationally recognized standards or if the Committee of Experts could suggest optimal numerical requirements. The speaker pointed out that negotiations became more difficult with a larger number of social partners, and the lower the numerical requirement, the larger the number of social partners.

The Workers' member of Greece was disappointed that the Employers' members had been reassured simply because Turkey had ratified Convention No. 87. In many countries, and notably in Greece, Conventions ratified long ago have not been implemented, as the Committee has recognized. It was important to point out that it was not sufficient merely to ratify a Convention. National legislation must also be brought into conformity with the Convention so that it would be respected. He wondered why the trade union DISK, member of the European Confederation of Trade Unions and a member of the Executive Board, was not participating in this meeting at the Conference.

The Government representative assured the Conference Committee that its observations and suggestions would be studied by the competent authorities of his country. He recalled that, as concerned the suppression of numerical requirements, there was a proposal for a law now under discussion which saw the suppression of the 10 per cent requirement. As to the rights of civil servants to organize, he recalled that, in the light of Conventions Nos. 87 and 151 on freedom of association, a proposal for a law concerning the procedures for determining the conditions of work for civil servants was being studied by Parliament. Concerning freedom of negotiation between the social partners, the speaker declared that his Government desired to enter this process as little as possible. He discarded the idea that there was no freedom for negotiation in Turkey, citing the 1,783 agreements concluded through free collective bargaining since 1982 and covering 1,090,000 workers, and the some 1,153,578 hours of work lost to strikes since that date. To conclude, the speaker pointed out that proposals for reform foreseen by his Government had been communicated to all concerned parties, including DISK, the HAK-IS, the TURK-IS and the TISK.

The Workers' members, referring to the intervention of the Employers' members, declared that the existing problems were not unimportant, and that it was necessary to continue to insist that the Government proceed with the requested modifications of the legislation. They considered that the problem of numerical requirements was not just that it served as a criterion for defining the most representative organizations but also the fact that the existing legislation had a double requirement. This resulted in the exclusion of a large proportion of workers. Concerning compulsory arbitration, they judged it indispensable to refer to the spirit of the Convention and the opinion of the Committee of Experts.

The Employers' members agreed with the Workers' members that it would be useful to modify the regulations concerning numerical requirements, even if an important trade union wanted to maintain the existing situation. Concerning the declarations of the Government representative they did not consider the fact that the large number of strikes signified important social progress. Concerning compulsory arbitration they felt that this procedure was valuable to the extent that non-ambiguous criteria were established and where the participation of the two parties was guaranteed. Relating to the formula utilized by the Committee of Experts, they preferred to hold to the letter of the Convention more than to its spirit, which they judged at times confused.

The Committee took note of the statement of the Government representative concerning the developments which had occurred and the discussions which had taken place at the Conference Committee. The Committee was pleased to note the recent ratification of Conventions Nos. 87, 135 and 151, which should lead to a better application of the present Convention. The Committee recalled, nevertheless, that for a number of years the Committee of Experts had noted important differences between legislation and the Convention. The Committee requested the Government to adopt measures to eliminate restrictions on collective bargaining resulting from the double criteria for judging the representativity of trade unions, so that they might bargain collectively with employers; and to promote collective bargaining as a means of determining conditions of work and for adopting specific legislative provisions to accord to workers in the public sector, covered by the Convention, the right to form trade unions so as to enable them to bargain collectively on the conditions of their employment. The Commission insisted that the next report of the Government should provide details on the application of the Convention, particularly the concrete measures taken to stimulate and promote, as a priority, free collective bargaining. The Commission requested the Government to communicate the legislative proposals elaborated in this area. The Commission hoped to be able to signal major progress on these questions in the near future.

United Kingdom (ratification: 1950). A Government representative referred first to the Committee of Experts' comments on the United Kingdom Government's compliance with Article 4 of the Convention in relation to the determination of schoolteachers' pay and working conditions in England and Wales. In its report, the Government had provided information on the establishment of an independent review body to make recommendations on the pay and conditions of teachers in England and Wales and also on the public endorsement of this body by five out of six of the national unions representing teachers in service. In response to a request from the Committee of Experts, it had provided information on the statutory powers of the review body and of its practical functioning during the pay rounds of 1992 and 1993 including particularly the involvement of all teachers' unions and employers' associations. In its report, the Committee of Experts recorded this information and concluded that, "the Committee notes the information provided by the Government and trusts that the new pay review machinery for schoolteachers will not be applied in practice so as to hamper the freedom of collective bargaining". He believed that both the constitution and practical operation of the review body were consistent with that objective. Consequently, he found no issue in the Committee of Experts' report to explain or defend to this Committee. However, the mere fact that the subject of schoolteachers' pay machinery had been selected for discussion, suggested clearly that there was perhaps some problem of which neither his Government nor the Committee of Experts had been informed. He thus suggested that the Workers' representative give his Government any information received on the matter without taking the issue any further in this Committee today. That approach, he believed, would be in accordance with the written agreement which the Government had reached with the TUC and CBI, to meet the requirements for tripartite consultation concerning reporting procedures under Convention No. 144 so as to enable them to provide comments to the Committee of Experts on the issues raised, if necessary. In the meantime, he considered it would be premature and possibly contrary to the established procedure of the ILO's supervisory machinery for this Committee to consider now any issues which neither the Government nor the Committee of Experts had had the chance to consider. With respect to the Committee of Experts' comments on the protection available in the United Kingdom to those who were rejected for a job because of their trade union membership or activity, he stated that, since 1978, his Government considered that the requirements of Convention No. 98 in this regard were met by the provisions of the Employment Protection (Consolidation) Act of that year. However, with the introduction of the Employment Act, 1990, the Government specifically extended protection to ensure that individuals would not be denied employment on the grounds of trade union membership. He elaborated further that Section 1 of the 1990 Act provided that an individual's ability to obtain a job should not be affected by the question of whether or not they were a member of a trade union by making it unlawful for an employer to refuse to employ anyone on the grounds of such membership or non-membership, or for refusal to join or for cessation of membership of a trade union. Anyone who was refused employment on these grounds could complain to an industrial tribunal and it would be for the tribunal to decide the complaint on the facts of the case. If a tribunal found that an individual had been unlawfully refused employment for reasons relating to trade union membership, it would make a declaration to that effect and could also award the complainant compensation to be paid by the prospective employer and/or would recommend that the prospective employer take action to remedy the damage of that unlawful refusal. It could, for example, recommend that the employer should consider the complainant for a job vacancy, although it could not order them to do so. The tribunal would assess and award any compensation on the same basis as damages for breach of statutory duty, and this might include compensation for injury to feelings. In cases where an employer against whom a complaint was upheld failed, without reasonable justification, to comply with a recommendation, the tribunal might increase the amount of its award if it had not already done so up to a maximum limit of £11,000. In his view, these were substantial legislative provisions, by any standards, explicitly outlawing discrimination in recruitment on grounds of trade union membership and providing appropriate remedies. He remarked that the Committee of Experts had taken note of this and conceded that this might offer "some remedy" against acts of discrimination against trade union membership but added that it "considers that the existence of legislative provisions prohibiting such acts is not sufficient if these provisions are not accompanied by effective procedures ensuring their application in practice and machinery appropriate to national conditions should be established, where necessary, to ensure respect for the right to organize". It was not at all clear what procedures and machinery the Committee of Experts had in mind and it unfortunately offered no further explanation except to echo the regret of the Committee on Freedom of Association in Case No. 1618, that the Government did not take any measures to implement the recommendations of the House of Commons Select Committee cited in that case. The relevant recommendations of that House Committee were that all organizations supplying information about potential employees should be subject to licensing and to a code of practice, and if a potential employee were refused employment as a result of the information supplied, it should be passed on to the employee to provide a chance for that information to be rejected. The Government had not accepted these recommendations because it believed that they would impose significant additional burdens on all organizations supplying information to prospective employers (which would, for example, include previous employers, banks, schools and colleges) without improving the protection available to jobseekers. The provisions of the Data Protection Act 1984 already provided some protection against the supply of inaccurate information, and it was not clear that the Select Committee's recommendations, if implemented, would have offered much further assistance to trade union members rejected for jobs they had applied for. Even if such trade union members had found that the information passed on to them by the organizations was entirely accurate, how would they have known that it was complete? And if they had been rejected for a job, how would they have known whether the employer's decision was based on information supplied by particular organizations, rather than, for example, through informal discussions with friends which would never have been recorded? He believed the crucial issue in all these cases was not the information which employers received about jobseekers, but the use which the employers decided to make of that information in refusing to offer them employment. In other words, it was not the information itself, but the reasons for refusing employment which constituted discrimination on trade union membership grounds which was precisely the area covered by Section 1 of the Employment Act, 1990. This legislation had therefore tackled the real problem of discrimination in recruitment which the Select Committee's recommendations would have left entirely untouched. He was confident that the industrial tribunal system in the United Kingdom did provide what the Committee of Experts had called for in terms of "effective procedures" and "appropriate national machinery". He considered that industrial tribunals had the expertise and practical experience needed for the most searching scrutiny of cases of denial of employment on grounds of trade union membership. He believed that the United Kingdom Government had put into place both the legislation necessary to ban discrimination in recruitment on grounds of trade union membership and as forceful and as practical a means of implementing this legislation as could reasonably be provided. He therefore invited this Committee to accept that these measures complied fully with the requirements of Articles 1 and 3 of the Convention.

The Workers' members thanked the Government representative for his statement and said that the somewhat complex arguments should be put into some sort of context to render them less abstract. Just to show that it was wrong to assume there were no complaints against the United Kingdom Government in the past regarding Convention No. 98, he recalled that this Committee and the Committee of Experts had experienced various difficulties with the British Government, including the GCHQ case at Cheltenham. Unless the important principles involved in the GCHQ case were resolved, the other serious conflicts in the United Kingdom's legislation and practice, relating to both Conventions Nos. 87 and 98, regularly reported on by the Committee of Experts, could not be usefully pursued with the United Kingdom Government. If all or even part of the problems involving the United Kingdom in this respect were taken up, the discussion would have monopolized the work of this Committee. He further recalled that in the past 13 or 14 years, there had been about six or eight new major pieces of legislation that had succeeded in reducing either the rights or effectiveness of trade unionists in Great Britain. Some clauses of these laws went to the very limits of what the Conventions allowed and others went even beyond those limits and have been the subject of the comments of the Committee of Experts which, at one stage, remarked that the very weight and amount of the legislation was itself repressive. In his view, the British Government had, through this body of legislation, made the whole country into an export processing zone and in the process had not, of course, respected the Tripartite Declaration of Principles concerning Multinational Enterprises and Social Policy, adopted by the Governing Body in November 1977 which states: "where governments of host countries offer special incentives to attract foreign investment, these incentives should not include any limitation of the workers' freedom of association or the right to organize and bargain collectively" as cited in paragraph 60 of the Committee's General Survey of this year. In his view, there was a prolonged and sustained attack by the British Government upon trade unions. Regarding the questions of denial of employment on the grounds of trade union membership or activity, he wished to recall the nasty and vicious role played by the former Economic League by providing blacklists of trade unionists to unscrupulous employers. He stated that the existing United Kingdom legislation was not sufficient to deal with any new similar bodies whose sole purpose was anti-trade union discrimination. Indeed, the TUC understood that leading figures from the former Economic League had bought an "off the peg" company and, using information previously held by the League which, it had appeared, not been destroyed as claimed, were once again providing a similar service to unprincipled employers. He referred to the passages quoted by the Government representative from the third paragraph of the observation of the Committee of Experts and considered that the Committee was drawing the Government's attention to the need to create the condition in law which would enable a trade union to defend itself. It was up to the Government to choose the manner and the means by which it wished to resolve this question. Regarding the question of schoolteachers' pay and working conditions in England and Wales, he said he based his remarks on information he had obtained from the largest teachers' organization in the United Kingdom, the National Union of Teachers. Referring to the statement of the Government representative that five out of six trade unions were taking part in collective bargaining under this machinery, he said that, even if certain unions had accepted a law or a governmental decision, this did not ensure conformity with the Convention. Neither did it stop the Committee of Experts from commenting about the matter. In his view, the teachers' union was rightly basing its position on Article 4 of Convention No. 98. Referring to the final passage of the observation of the Committee of Experts, also cited by the Government representative, he was of the view that the Committee of Experts was simply pointing out that the review machinery was acceptable to the extent it did not hinder collective bargaining. It was their considered view that the machinery and its functioning, as described by the Government and reflected in the observation of the Committee of Experts, did not provide for voluntary negotiation between employers' and workers' organizations with actual meetings in the review body to conduct negotiations to regulate the "terms and conditions of employment by collective agreements". He was wary about the suggestion made by the Government representative about circumventing this Committee to conduct tripartite consultations on this question given the experience of the pointless similar discussions in the GCHQ case. He concluded by saying that the Committee of Experts could assess the information provided and the views expressed here and could then give its comments on whether the workings of the review machinery constituted collective bargaining within the terms of the Convention.

The Employers' members recalled that in the last 15 years this Committee had not been confronted with the need to discuss the application by the United Kingdom of Convention No. 98. But on the other hand it had discussed, on many occasions and at length, cases involving the United Kingdom under Convention No. 87 and invariably the expected explosive petered out. The case before this Committee this year as usual touched only a limited number of issues. The Workers' members, in presenting their views on all the amendments adopted in the last few years to the pertinent United Kingdom legislation, had considered this legislation to be too much and complex. The Employers' members found this view surprising because the Convention did not require the simplification of the legislation. They considered it was more prudent to stick to the few concrete points in this case. Point 1(a) of the observation of the Committee of Experts concerned the issue of whether, in the United Kingdom, there was sufficient protection against denial of employment on grounds of trade union membership or activity. The Committee of Experts rightfully recalled that Convention No. 98 required that protection appropriate to national conditions should be established but without adding, as it did in its General Survey, that this should also be accompanied by sanctions. This last point was important in their view because international labour standards had to be incorporated into extremely varied legal systems and the ILO could not impose on every Member the same method of incorporation. In this particular case, the United Kingdom was a country with a long tradition of the rule of law and its legal system afforded each individual a whole range of possibilities of access to courts and remedies including compensation and sanctions. Contrary to the conclusion that the Committee of Experts seemed to make, the British legal system provided adequate protection. The Committee's observation also referred to the recommendations of a Parliamentary Select Committee whose recommendations were not implemented. This was, in their view, an internal matter that should be left to the discretion of the Government. They welcomed the fact that the Economic League referred to by the Workers' members was a thing of the past, dissolved without government intervention. The Committee of Experts had noted this with interest and this aspect did not, therefore, call for any particular comment. In respect of the second question dealing with the determination of schoolteacher's pay and working conditions, it was sufficient to remark that, while the existing system might be relatively complex, it was none the less balanced, and it ensured the participation of all the parties and satisfied almost everybody. The Committee of Experts did not make any criticism in this regard. The fact that salary increases of 7.5 per cent had been awarded seemed to indicate that the system had fulfilled its role of ensuring appropriate working conditions for teachers. The Committee of Experts did not share the criticism made by the Workers' members but it expressed the hope that the new system would function in a satisfactory manner. Following an assessment of the results achieved, this Committee might, if necessary, re-examine the question.

The Government representative of Belgium, having noted the progress made on this question, raised the problem of the consequences of the extreme complexity of the United Kingdom legislation in this area which mystified the rights of workers and complicated parliamentary and international supervision, as had already been mentioned by the Government of Belgium in the context of the application of the European Social Charter. The permanent link established between employment and industrial relations raised questions about the extent of the will of the Government to establish a clearly defined framework for industrial relations. This Committee ran the risk of entering into an analysis of this case if, at the same time as it took note of satisfactory comments, it uncovered more new subtleties in the very complex machinery. The Committee was justified in requesting a clarification and stabilization of industrial relations in the United Kingdom in the interest of everyone.

The Government representative of the United Kingdom wished to respond with regard to two points in relation to the complexity of the legislation. One of the pieces of legislation which provided for the protection of trade union members was actually the one being debated today. This showed that all the legislation was not targeted against trade unions. He also wished to reassure the Government member of Belgium and pointed out there had been Consolidation Acts, the most recent being the 1992 one, which actually helped clarify the law. He expressed his disappointment that a letter coming from one of the six teachers' trade unions and sent to the TUC had not been passed to them prior to discussion in this Committee. The right procedure would have been for this Committee to endorse the normal standard procedure which would have been for that letter to be passed to the Government so that it could report on the matter to the Committee of Experts, and if necessary, back to this Committee. It seemed to him that to bypass this procedure would undermine the functioning of Convention No. 144 and this should be reflected in the conclusions of this Committee under the point relating to the issue about the teachers' pay machinery. He wished to stress the point that the views heard today were the comments of one trade union out of six and that the other five unions which had endorsed the procedure of the review body represented some 65 per cent of teachers in service. Surveys of teachers had also consistently identified a higher proportion than that supported by the review body. Even a substantial proportion of the membership of the National Union of Teachers was understood to support the review body approach. There was, therefore, no doubt in his mind that this issue had in fact been resolved in accordance with the wishes of the majority of teachers. He agreed with the suggestion put forward by the Employers' members that the thing to do at this stage was for this Committee to wait and see how that review body operated before, if necessary, this Committee – and certainly before the Committee of Experts – could take account of whether, in fact, the review body operated in a way consistent with the requirements of collective bargaining. With regard to the question of the protection against the ban and denial of employment on grounds of trade union membership, he expressed gratitude to the approach adopted by the Employers' members and noted that the Workers' members did not comment on the provisions of Section 1 of the 1990 Act which, in his view, clearly banned discrimination in recruitment on grounds of membership or non-membership of the trade union. He reaffirmed that the United Kingdom industrial tribunal system provided both the procedures and remedies which offered effective protection to individuals who believed they were the victims of such discrimination. Thus he stated that the United Kingdom Government was in full compliance with Articles 1 and 3 of Convention No. 98.

The Workers' members agreed with the Government member of Belgium when he pointed out the complexity of the United Kingdom's legislation in this area. The Committee of Experts had in the past made this point as well as having noted that the amount of legislation was in itself repressive. They disagreed with the views of the Employers' members that the first part of the observation of the Committee of Experts was almost laudatory. They also pointed out that, for lack of other remedies, trade unionists had to resort to all sorts of ways to deal with the Economic League, including the use of libel laws which, in Great Britain, required an enormous amount of money. Referring to the statement made by the Government representative that one of the Acts in question was in fact designed to help trade unions, they said that a certain clause in that Act was already the subject of a complaint before the Committee on Freedom of Association. With regard to the question of the determination of schoolteachers' pay and working conditions, they said they had nothing against conducting tripartite consultations, as suggested by the Government representative, but considered there was no harm in also continuing to review in this Committee and the Committee of Experts the problems created by the review machinery which, it should be recalled, was imposed without consultation on the teachers.

The Employers' members said that by not discussing the points raised by the Government representative and instead debating directly with them, the Workers' members had implicitly admitted that the substance of this case was limited. Without reverting back to the general question of the manner by which international labour standards were to be incorporated into national jurisdictions, they would agree with the Workers' members that it would be an ideal situation if there were, in general, only a few simple laws. That, however, would not prevent criticism of countries where the legislation was simple but insufficient. In the case of the United Kingdom it was clear that the protection appropriate to national conditions required by the Convention was assured by the access to courts provided to every victim of discrimination. The Committee of Experts did not, unfortunately, indicate the particular inadequacies of the current legal provisions. With regard to the system of fixing the working conditions of teachers, there was nothing to indicate that collective bargaining was being hindered at the moment. If there were such hindrances, this Committee would return to the matter.

The Committee noted the report of the Committee of Experts, the statement made by the Government representative and the information he provided on the practical application of the Convention as well as the discussion. The Committee noted certain developments with regard to the strengthening of protection against anti-trade union discrimination and the establishment of a new mechanism to deal with teachers' wages and working conditions. The Committee expressed the hope that the Government would continue to provide the ILO's supervisory bodies with all detailed information on measures taken concerning the legal protection against anti-trade union discrimination and on guaranteeing the unfettered rights of teachers to negotiate freely their working conditions with their employers.

The Workers' members referring to the Conclusions adopted by the Committee regarding the application by the United Kingdom of Convention No. 98 regretted that some elements were not included in these conclusions because of the objections of the Employers' members. This was happening for the second time this year whereas in similar circumstances in the past the Committee had none the less adopted its conclusions and registered, as well, the reservations of the Employer's members. In their view, this constituted a dangerous situation that the officers of the Committee should address in an informal meeting.

Convention No. 100: Equal Remuneration, 1951

Japan (ratification: 1967). A Government representative indicated that his Government had been making efforts to enforce the Labour Standards Act, 1947, which prohibited sex discrimination with respect to wages so that the requirements of the Convention were fully met. He explained that, although the insufficient response by the Government to the comments of the Committee of Experts was due to the situation of the labour market and the practice of employment management in Japan, the Government would endeavour to supply the appropriate information as far as possible. He stressed that the gap between the average wages of men and women had been diminishing. For example, the difference in wages per hour between men and women had been reduced by 3.3 per cent over the last seven or eight years. As a result, in 1992 women's wages represented 62 per cent of men's wages. This tendency would continue slowly but steadily. Average wage differences between the sexes were a reflection of differences between sectors, the size of companies, as well as the occupations men and women were engaged in. Even within the same sector, these differences resulted from the various technical skills which companies required taking into account the difference between men and women in their academic backgrounds and the number of years of service. His Government had been making efforts to implement and enforce the Equal Employment Opportunity Act, 1985, so that differences in the average wages between the sexes could be reduced through securing equal opportunity and treatment in employment. In particular the guideline established under the Act had been revised in April 1994 after consultations had been held with employers' and workers' organizations. The revised guideline included two new objectives: to stop female students from being treated unfairly at the recruitment stage and to prevent married women from being treated unfairly when they were assigned and promoted. Moreover, regarding the narrowing of the gap in the average wages of men and women through reducing differences in the number of years of service, his Government had been promoting measures to help workers harmonize their working lives with their family lives and to enable women who wanted to continue working to do so while still bringing up their children. These measures included the application of the child care leave system contained in the Child Care Leave Act of 1992, the introduction of a system of reducing worked hours as well as the provision of a subsidy to employers to compensate them for part of the costs associated with establishing and running a day nursery within the company, and to help women return easily to their jobs after their child care leave. Owing to these various efforts, more women had come to be engaged in occupations where few were found in the past such as in electrical, chemical and information processing engineering, journalism, editing and even as guards, engine drivers and so on. Moreover, the attitude of companies towards the assignment of women had changed. The result of a recent survey stated that the percentage of companies which "assign all occupations according to one's ability and aptitude" had increased from 23 per cent in 1989 to 50 per cent in 1992, while those which "assign women to only less important jobs" had decreased from 7.9 per cent in 1989 to 5.3 per cent in 1992. Besides, the average number of years of service of women had increased steadily from 4.5 in 1970 to 7.4 in 1992.

The Employers' members stated that the principle which had to be applied in this case gave rise to many difficulties. An important point in the comments made by the Committee of Experts was the demand for objective criteria. In the Employers' view, a starting point for evaluation was generally that the average income for women was to a certain extent lower than the average income for men. The reasons for this needed to be verified. Once again, it was a question of determining what criteria were at the basis of wages. In Japan, seniority, i.e. the length of service, had an important impact on the amount of the salary. Seniority was an objective criteria since it could not be manipulated but was a fact. However, the tendency among the Committee of Experts was to apply other factors instead of seniority. The experts had indicated that the content of the job should be the yardstick for establishing remuneration. However, there were historic reasons as to why women usually had lower seniority as well as why there continued to be typical men's jobs and typical women's jobs. The experts required that the same wages had to be paid for work of equal value but this did not explain what criteria should lie at the basis of this. In the Employers' members' view, there were no scientifically objective methods of evaluating equal value of jobs in connection with what wages should be paid for those jobs. The solution lay in overcoming barriers such as separate labour markets for men and women which had been inherited from the past. Enterprises in the industrialized countries had already made efforts to this end and the results of this were only being seen very gradually. The most important reason for this gradual change could be attributed to traditional attitudes held by people which could only be changed by education and conviction but not by legislation. The solution to these problems would certainly require a period of time but any progress began with the recognition that there was a problem; this recognition had taken place during this and other discussions on the subject.

The Workers' members took note of the statement of the Government representative according to which a full report would be transmitted to the Committee of Experts. This case had already been discussed during the last Conference. In this regard, it was appropriate to recall the previous conclusions of this Committee which had first of all noted that the differences in wages were much more significant in Japan than in other industrialized countries and that a considerable number of women were confined to sectors where wages were lowest. This Committee had considered that the problem should be solved within the framework of a global policy and not through the adoption of ad hoc measures. Last year, the commitment made by the Government to this Committee to remedy the situation was equivocal and lacked clarity. Incomplete information which was transmitted to the Committee of Experts and noted in this year's report showed that there was a significant gap between the monthly wages of men and women and was, moreover, confirmed by international studies on the subject. It was true that while this gap was more significant in Japan than in other industrialized countries, the difference was even more significant in countries which did not have any legislation or truly appropriate procedures and which did not undertake any action to convince enterprises to change practices which, directly or indirectly, had negative effects on the rights of women. The Employers' members had stated that the Government representative had listed a series of ad hoc measures. However, the Workers' members considered that this information was imprecise and difficult to use since several issues remained pending. The Workers' members subscribed to the views of the Committee of Experts which rightly had taken note of the increased efforts made by the Government to promote equality of opportunity and treatment and which had underlined the need to establish non-discriminatory criteria to evaluate the different work accomplished by men and women. It was appropriate to insist that the Government continue to implement the measures and the initiatives that it had described and that it multiply its efforts in the legislative field as well as in the field of labour market policy in the wide sense of the term. All means had to be used in order to change the discriminatory practices of enterprises.

The Workers' member of Japan felt that his Government should supply all the necessary information requested by the Committee of Experts as soon as possible. In their observation this year, the experts stated that they lacked information on the measures to evaluate and compare the value of the different work performed by men and women on the basis of objective criteria. He urged the Government to provide adequate information on this matter. The Government representative had said that the wage gap in Japan had been diminishing and that this tendency would continue slowly but steadily. However, the speaker maintained that there was still a wide wage gap between men and women in Japan. According to a study carried out by the Japanese Trade Union Confederation, women's wages stood at around 60 per cent of men's wages. The Japanese Government should therefore promote its policy and accelerate ongoing "slow and steady" improvement. Regarding labour laws concerning equality of employment, Japan had the Labour Standards Act, the Equal Employment Opportunity Act, the Child Care Leave Act, the Part-time Labour Act and so on. These laws had contributed to improving the situation. However, many matters needed to be improved and the Government needed to revise the relevant labour laws and ordinances properly so that effective measures could be taken. He was of the view that other ILO Conventions should be ratified in order to achieve full equality between men and women and, in particular, the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111), the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144) and the Workers with Family Responsibilities Convention, 1981 (No. 156).

The Government representative of Japan concluded that with regard to the gap between the average wages of men and women, his Government had to fully recognize the present situation and had to make progress by continuing to enforce the measures which were accepted and supported by both the organizations of employers and workers concerned.

The Committee noted the information and explanations supplied by the Government representative. The Committee noted that the Government had made increased efforts to promote the aims of the Convention and that some concrete measures had been taken to ensure in law and in practice the application of the Convention. It had noted, however, that serious discrepancies existed in the implementation of the principle recognized in the Convention, particularly due to the absence of any system of objective evaluation of jobs and the maintenance of a specific system whereby length of service was taken into account for the determination of wages. The Committee hoped that the Government would continue to make all necessary efforts and also, in general terms, to give full effect in law and in practice to the provisions of the Convention and that it would supply full and detailed information in its next report.

New Zealand (ratification: 1983). A Government representative stated that her Government was somewhat surprised that the request for further information on the application of Convention No. 100 was raised as a matter for consideration by this Committee. The observation made by the Committee of Experts raised no issues, legal or otherwise, over New Zealand's compliance with the Convention and, therefore, there was no basis for any substantive discussion. Her Government would, of course, respond to the request for further information in the same way as it consistently complied with all of its reporting obligations. Given the nature of the information sought, this would necessarily take some time. However, this information would be included in the next report on the application of this Convention which, according to the established practice and to Convention No. 144, would also be the subject of consultation with the employers' and workers' organizations.

The Workers' members that this case on Convention No. 100 raised important problems in respect of the principles and interests which were involved. They wished to have more information on the question of whether the new approach to the functioning of the labour market promoted by the Government by virtue of the law of 1991, that favoured individual contracts at the expense of collective agreements, did not require the adoption of additional measures to guarantee equality of remuneration between men and women. As a result of this law, an increasing proportion of workers was not covered by collective agreements, and female employees who were concentrated in the services sector and in small and medium-sized enterprises were particularly affected by this approach. In 1972 and 1977 New Zealand had introduced a system of fixing wages by collective agreements inspired by the principles of the ILO. This legislation had been completed in 1990 by introducing the notion of equal pay for work of equal value and by the introduction of action plans to promote effective equality of treatment between men and women. However, this legislation was repealed by the new law of 1991 which favoured wage-fixing on an individual basis and necessarily affected the machinery for implementing equality of treatment. This affected access to the information on the level of wages, because wages paid on an individual basis could not be sufficiently made known; the effective application of the principle of equal pay for work of equal value and the complaints procedure against discrimination; and also had implications concerning the protection of women against acts of discrimination or intimidation when they sought to defend their rights before the competent tribunals or other bodies. As noted by the Committee of Experts' report, the Labour Inspectorate had received only one complaint under the Equal Pay Act during the period 1990-93. The Workers' members considered that it was an important case because equality of remuneration should be applied equitably under any labour market system, and it was for this reason that they had proposed to discuss the case. They would like the Government to provide more information on recent developments with respect to the effective implementation of equality of remuneration, including remuneration stipulated in individual contracts, in the services sector and in other sectors employing a large number of women. The Workers' members insisted that the Government should, in conformity with the requirements of the Convention, ensure that legislation and implementing machinery corresponded to the specific needs of a deregulated labour market, so as to guarantee and promote the principle of equality of remuneration.

The Employers' members noted that the comments made by the Committee of Experts were very general in nature. However, they raised concern over the possible impact of the new legislation on the question of equal treatment and equal remuneration for men and women, taking into account the increased emphasis placed by the Government on individual contracts and the reduced importance attached to collective agreements. The Employers' members fully understood that such a development was a source of preoccupation with workers, though they believed that workers could also defend their interests on the basis of individual contracts, in particular, in countries where citizens were well aware of their rights and how to implement them. They pointed out that there was no criticism levelled by the Committee of Experts with regard to the legislation and measures adopted by the Government, but that there was only a request for further information to be supplied in the next report. The Employers' members felt sure that the Government would in fact follow up this request.

The Workers' member of New Zealand stated that, after having been the first country in the world to give women the right to vote a hundred years ago, extremist free market policies combined with an attack on the role of the State, as well as privatization, reductions in social welfare provisions and a deregulated labour market introduced by the Employment Contracts Act, had put New Zealand in serious breach of its legal obligations under this fundamental Convention. The latest statistics showed a steady trend to widening the gap between men's and women's wages since the introduction of this Act, which also rendered obsolete and totally ineffective the Equal Pay Act and its state sector equivalent. The only option left open in this situation was the use of the personal grievance provisions of the Employment Contracts Act or a complaint to the Human Rights Commission. In practice, these were totally ineffective in the environment created by the new Act, which was characterized by the following: (i) individual contracts were becoming much more common and remuneration was likely to be more varied by region, industry, firm and other factors which made it more difficult to establish discrimination in individual cases; (ii) fewer people were in a position to know what others were paid and thus whether there was any discrimination; (iii) merit and performance pay were becoming more common and there was evidence that they provided a great potential for unintended discrimination; (iv) support from a union was less likely to be available because of low levels of union coverage. Every indicator on what was happening to women in the labour force in New Zealand was showing a negative effect. The most disadvantaged were women in the clerical administration, retail and service sectors, who were low paid and increasingly casualized, and were being denied the opportunity to acquire skills and training to improve their position in the labour market. While this was a complex problem, the fundamental question for this Committee was whether the existence of a deregulated labour market was an acceptable excuse for the Government to do nothing to provide for equal pay for work of equal value. It must ask the Government what it intended to do to provide for equality of remuneration between men and women under the Employment Contracts Act and what changes were needed to this Act to meet the requirements of the Convention. She stated that the Government had not replied substantively to the Committee of Experts for the last three years and must be asked now to supply the full report for next year.

The Workers' member of Singapore considered that in evaluating the measures undertaken by the Government, one had to determine whether they were sufficient to ensure that women received equal pay for work of equal value. If the statistics showed that women's wages continued to lag significantly behind that of men, the adequacy of these measures had to be re-examined. The common difficulty with laws dealing with individual grievances was that the process of enforcing them was often arduous, time-consuming, expensive and thus generally prohibitive, especially for women who were already disadvantaged in their position in society and in the resources available to them. This was supported by the fact that between 1990 and 1993 the Labour Inspectorate in New Zealand received only one complaint under the Equal Pay Act. Wondering whether the mere publication of a manual issued by the Government was sufficient, she emphasized that a conscious effort had to be made to integrate the policy of equal pay for work of equal value at all strategic levels of decision-making. Access to information was critical in this respect and, from the comments made by the Committee of Experts, it appeared that such information was lacking and should be provided by the Government as soon as possible.

The Workers' member of the United States said that a similar experience in the United States had showed that one should examine whether there was a pattern or practice of inequity that extended beyond the experience of a single isolated individual. As was pointed out, the legislation recently enacted in New Zealand was designed for individual and not for class action complaints. Individual contracts were not an adequate substitute for collective bargaining. An isolated individual was far less likely to have the resources or knowledge of the extent of similar inequality elsewhere in the same firm, much less in the same industry or in the economy at large. In New Zealand there was substantial statistical evidence that in occupations with a large number of women, such as nurses, retail, and hotel workers, the ratio of women's pay to that of men's had declined since the new legislation was enacted. A similar philosophy in the United States – that no government was a good government – resulted in deregulation to serve that ideology, and inequality increased substantially during the decade; sweatshops and child labour, which were presumed to be historical artifacts, returned as facts of working life. For this reason he urged the Government of New Zealand to recognize that a deregulated labour market was an unequal labour market and to adjust its law and practice accordingly, so as to better conform to the Convention.

The Government member of Germany was convinced that if the Committee of Experts asked certain questions, they did so because they had the suspicion at the outset that the Convention was possibly not being implemented in the proper way. The experts were asking for an early report and their comments contained not just questions but also certain points of criticism in connection with the application of this Convention, as well as that of Convention No. 42. The Committee of Experts was asking for further information on particular measures, including arbitration procedures and the results of ongoing research and studies. The collection of such information would require time and should first be submitted to the experts for their evaluation; for that reason he considered that the position of the Government representative of New Zealand was perfectly understandable in that she could not give this Committee completely comprehensive information in respect of these points.

The Workers' member of Pakistan associated himself with the concerns expressed by other Workers' members on this vital issue of the discrimination of women, mostly in the developing countries, but also in the developed countries. The statistics invoked by the Workers' member of New Zealand showed that women were still subject to discrimination, particularly after the introduction of the new legislation. To comply with its obligations under the Convention, the Government should carry out objective appraisals of the jobs on the basis of the work performed, in consultation with the employers' and workers' organizations, in order to enforce equality in the payment of wages. Therefore, he urged the Government to take into account the observation made by the Committee of Experts in carrying out its constitutional obligation to ensure the principle of equality of treatment.

The Government member of the United Kingdom supported the comments made by the Government member of Germany. He stated that most of the information that had been given to this Committee was not included in the Committee of Experts' report. This was not the appropriate way to submit such information, as this Committee had always based its work on the report of the experts. His Government therefore considered it wrong that cases, such as this one, had been selected when there had been no explicit criticism by the experts, but only a number of requests for further information. If it was selected merely to ensure a so-called equitable, reasonable distribution of cases, his Government would suggest that the wrong criteria were being used for the selection of cases and that this could undermine the credibility of this Committee. It would be far more profitable if this Committee were to spend its valuable time either on the more serious cases of human rights abuses, which, it seemed, were being passed by for purely political purposes, or on cases of progress from which lessons could be learned. If the supervisory system was not to fall into disrepute, he hoped that this situation would not be repeated in future years, and suggested that the Committee should perhaps establish stronger criteria in future for the selection of cases.

The Workers' member of Germany, referring to the comments made by the Government members of Germany and of the United Kingdom, emphasized the significance of the discussion in this Committee on such important cases. Even if there were difficulties in providing comprehensive information, it would nevertheless have been possible for the Government representative of New Zealand to have shown the political will of the Government to fully implement Convention No. 100. She could have done this explicitly, which would have made this dialogue much more significant and relevant. He therefore considered that such cases concerning possible violations of fundamental rights should be continued to be discussed and dealt with in this Committee in the future in order to give the governments an opportunity to express a positive attitude to the supervisory machinery and to the relevant Conventions.

The Government member of the United States explained her Government's view of what kind of cases should be discussed in this Committee. When the Workers' and Employers' members decided what cases should go on the list, they considered a lot of things: which cases were serious, which cases had been cited in footnotes, which were discussed in this Committee on previous occasions and whether there had been any important new developments in those cases. They tried to develop a list that included a range of countries and a range of Conventions. She believed that this Committee should not limit the list of cases to a certain type of case and discuss only serious, flagrant abuses of human rights Conventions. There were other types of Conventions and other types of problems to be looked at. Her Government believed that when a country was asked to appear before this Committee, it was not tantamount to being on some sort of a black list. If only the most serious cases had to be looked at, then by definition it would not be possible to look at cases of progress which should also be discussed in this Committee. She was glad to note that there were more discussions in this Committee on Convention No. 100 which was an important Convention. However, she hoped that there would be no exaggeration in this Committee of a case so that it appeared that the situation was more serious than the Committee of Experts had indicated it to be. This could threaten the credibility of the supervisory system.

The Government representative of New Zealand reiterated that her Government would comply fully with the Committee of Experts' request for further information in its next report and in consultation with the social partners.

The Workers' members thanked the Government representative of New Zealand for her undertaking to provide the information requested. Concerning the remarks made in relation to the list of cases, they also thanked the Government representative of the United States for having recalled the criteria and the spirit in which the draft list of cases was prepared. The Workers' members judged it necessary to deal with this case in order to draw the attention of the Government of New Zealand to the importance of the questions raised by the experts on this matter, which were also important for a number of other countries as well. As to the content of the discussion, they considered that in fact it was not yet clear whether the new law undermined equality of remuneration between men and women. However, many Workers' members stressed that, having regard to their practical experiences, the danger of this was real and it was important that it should be monitored and that the obligations under the Convention be respected. To do this, it was necessary that effective legal machinery be established and dynamic action be undertaken by the Government. It was therefore appropriate to stress in the conclusions the need to have, as soon as possible, complete information so as to be able to assess the situation in New Zealand.

The Committee took note of the statement made by the Government representative, in particular the indication that her Government would provide further information with its next report due on this Convention. The Committee also took note of the various facts and views expressed in the course of the discussion. The Committee considered that the Government should provide the information requested by the Committee of Experts concerning a survey on bargaining structures, process and outcomes. The Committee also requested the Government to supply statistics on wages earned in sectors with a large number of female employees, such as the services sector. It further requested information on how the current machinery guaranteed, in the absence of collective bargaining, the principle of equal remuneration contained in the Convention. The Committee hoped that, on the basis of this additional information, the Committee of Experts would be in a position to further examine these issues more thoroughly.

Saudi Arabia (ratification: 1978). The Government supplied the following information:

The Government thanks the Committee of Experts for its open-mindedness, favouring dialogue. It counts on the Committee's comprehension with respect to the application of the Convention, to convince it that the principle of equality of treatment and of wages is really applied in the Kingdom, as has been demonstrated in certain examples which have been given in its last report in 1993. The Government notes that the Committee of Experts is not convinced by the explanations given and that it upholds that the national legislation should prohibit, through legislative provisions, any discrimination based on gender and reinforce equality of remuneration between men and women for work of equal value. The Government wishes to clarify the following points:

1. In Saudi Arabia, the Labour Code is applied to all workers without distinction as to gender or nationality, which implies that the Code covers all male and female workers as far as their rights and obligations, including wages, are concerned. Naturally, this equality can only be applied if the nature of the work, its conditions and its circumstances are equal. Thus, the discrimination mentioned in Chapter X of the above Code has no connection with these rights but rules on the protection of women and on the granting of additional advantages.

2. The principle of equality between male and female workers who perform equal work is based on the principles of justice. It has already been mentioned that in accordance with the Convention, the Labour Code, in its section 185, establishes the principle of equality by providing that labour and conciliation committees are bound to refer to the provisions and regulations of the Sharia and to the principles of law, custom and justice. The Sharia is the Constitution of the Kingdom whose principles prescribe the establishment of justice and of equality between all persons without discrimination on the grounds of gender, nationality or religion. The decision of the supreme conciliation commission relating to labour matters, mentioned in the previous report, may be taken as proof for the application of this principle. It is known that the Constitution represents the supreme law in every country. The Sharia – the Constitution of the Kingdom – is considered to be the supreme law as it is of divine source and its written principles are expressed in the verses of the Koran and the hadiths (sayings) of the Prophet, which proves that the modalities of application of the principle of equality in the private sector are entirely in conformity with the provisions of this Convention. However, in spite of the positive indications and in conformity with the wish of the Committee of Experts, it has been decided to take the necessary legislative measures to confirm the principle of equality of treatment and remuneration. A copy of the relevant ministerial decision will be transmitted to the ILO.

3. With reference to the other requested information, the measures taken to confirm the application of the principle of equality, as prescribed by the Convention, have been mentioned in the previous report. The Ministry has prepared a guide for professional selection in the private sector, on the basis of the provisions of the international labour Conventions, to allow employers to determine the functions and the statutes in their business. Thus, every person being taken in for a job or a specific function will receive appropriate wages which guarantees equality in case of equality of qualification, experience and conditions and circumstances of work. With respect to the inexistence of a wage scale, the Government could not imagine one single wage scale as there are thousands of companies and factories that work in this sector. Section 115 of the Labour Code has empowered the Cabinet of Ministers to decide on a minimum wage if necessary. Considering that the level of wages is high in relation to the level of cost of living, there is no actual necessity to introduce minimum wages. It is known that in several countries, of which some are major industrial countries, there are no minimum wages.

In addition, a Government representative reiterated the above written information provided.

The Workers' members recalled that in 1993 the Committee had discussed a similar case with respect to Saudi Arabia concerning Convention No. 111 on Discrimination (Employment and Occupation), 1958. Like the case this year regarding the fundamental aspect of equal remuneration, it had concerned questions of equality of treatment of men and women. As the Government had sent a report this year the Committee of Experts had the possibility of making their comments. The Government should however be encouraged to continue to provide reports because the necessary dialogue can only take place if the Government concerned does not maintain the position that there is no need to take any measure in view of the conformity of the law and practice with the Convention. It should however be noted that the Committee of Experts had expressed the opposite view. The information provided this year does none the less herald a change of attitude on the part of the Government because of the fact that it had decided to adopt the necessary legal provisions to reaffirm the principle of equal treatment and remuneration between men and women. This would in its view meet the concerns of the Committee of Experts. As had been stated by the Committee of Experts in its General Survey of 1986, the practical implementation of equality of remuneration could only be ensured through the inclusion of such principle in the text of the law. Machinery for its implementation should also be developed and a dynamic process engaged. Questions of the implementation of the principle of equality are often raised in the adjudicatory bodies and with those engaged in implementing them in practice. Statistics in general revealed that gaps in remuneration of men and women existed even in industrialized countries too. However such gaps were more pronounced in countries lacking a dynamic approach at reducing these gaps as well as in countries where women did not have access to the judicial process for ensuring their rights. These questions concerned more women workers in small enterprises and the service sector as well as countries where the minimum wage was not fixed in accordance with the methods provided for in Conventions Nos. 26 and 131. This Committee should endorse the requests and suggestions of the Committee of Experts. The Government should continue to examine the situation and take appropriate measures to ensure the implementation of the Convention in practice. The Government should also be reminded of the usefulness of seeking the technical assistance of the ILO to overcome the problems of implementation of the Convention.

The Employers' members noted that this case was similar to the one discussed last year which had raised problems of dialogue with the Government. The question raised this year was whether national legislation contained appropriate provisions that anticipated and proscribed discrimination in remuneration based on sex. The Government's position that the existence in the Labour Code of a provision stating the general principle of equality of treatment sufficed to guarantee equal remuneration might in theory have been satisfactory. However, a general principle rarely suffices and the Convention required detailed provisions for its application. The Government seemed to have taken important steps in this direction in deciding to shortly adopt such provisions. The Employers' members also expressed the hope that these provisions would be implemented in practice. In addition, they recalled the Government had indicated that a Commission for Dispute Settlement dealt in practice with cases involving equality of treatment. They requested for more information from the Government representative on this question to be able to assess better the role of this Commission in the area. Even though some countries might face problems in compiling and providing appropriate statistics, they considered this should not be the case for Saudi Arabia. Finally, they considered that even in the absence of a minimum wage the legal means for establishing it should be provided for. The information provided led them to believe that the Government was making progress which warranted this Committee's encouragement.

The Government representative of Saudi Arabia, in reply to the Employers' members, stated that he possessed neither statistics nor detailed information on the workings of the Commission for Dispute Settlement. He promised to send the information when possible.

The Committee noted the written information and the oral explanations provided by the Government. It noted like the Committee of Experts had that the necessary measures for the full application of the Convention had not yet been taken by the Government. It expressed the firm hope that the Government would do its utmost to adopt the legislation to the requirements of the Convention, if necessary with the technical assistance of the International Labour Office. In this respect the Committee noted with interest the Government's decision to adopt a decree reaffirming the principle of equal treatment and remuneration between men and women, as well as the fact that a copy of this decree would be furnished to the International Labour Office. The Committee hoped that this decree would be adopted shortly in order to ensure that the law and practice fully complied with the provisions of the Convention.

Convention No. 111: Discrimination (Employment and Occupation), 1958

Brazil (ratification: 1965). A Government representative referred to the 1993 report of the Conference Committee, in which it was stated that the Government representative of Brazil "recognized the existence in his country of discrimination in employment, whose origins stemmed from the colonial period". With regard to the allegations to the effect that employers were demanding the sterilization of women workers, the "Government recognized the existence of a problem, but pointed out that to its knowledge no complaint about this had been reported. He recalled that Bills Nos. 229/91 and 667/91 prohibited that proof of sterilization be required." (Provisional Record, No. 25, 1993, page 25/52). Because these statements were general in nature and imprecise, they led the Committee of Experts to suppose that discrimination in employment on the basis of sex or race was of a degree and gravity that was not in reality the case. The Committee of Experts also deduced that numerous employers required certificates attesting to the sterilization of women who sought employment or who wished to preserve their jobs. However, the legal picture and the actual facts of the situation in his country were not as represented. In Brazil the principle of non-discrimination had constitutional status. In the Part concerning fundamental rights and safeguards, Article 5 provides that "Everyone is equal before the law, without distinction of any kind ..."; and in subsection I, it stated that "men and women are equal in rights and obligations, under the provision of this Constitution". With regard to social rights, Article 7 of the Magna Carta established the following: "XXX – Prohibition against differences in wages based on functions and criteria relating to sex, colour or civil status"; and, in subsection XX, it determined that the law should establish special incentives to promote the inclusion of women in the labour market. Within the framework of ordinary legislation, Act No. 7,716, of 5 January 1989, provided for a sentence of two to five years' imprisonment for those who impeded, denied or obstructed employment directly or indirectly in the Public Administration or in private enterprises on the basis of race or colour (sections 3 and 4). The Labour Laws Consolidation (CLT) did not permit restrictions in employment for women based on marriage or pregnancy, which would also obviously render illegal the requirement of certificates attesting to sterilization in order to obtain or preserve employment. Section 391 of the CLT provided: "The marriage or pregnancy of a woman does not constitute a just cause for the termination of the employment contract. No regulation of any kind shall be permitted in collective agreements or individual employment contracts that restrict the right of women to employment on the basis of marriage or pregnancy." In addition, in order to eliminate some causes of discrimination against employment of women, Act No. 6,136 of 1974 transferred to Social Security the obligation to pay the whole salary owed to women during maternity leave – a protection which the 1988 Constitution extended to 120 days (Article 7, XVIII) and prohibited the arbitrary dismissal or dismissal without cause of pregnant employees, from the date of confirmation of pregnancy until five months after delivery (section 10 of the Act on Transitional Constitutional Provisions). Also within the field of infra-constitutional legislation, it should be pointed out that Act No. 7,855 of 1989, whose objective was to eliminate other causes of discrimination, repealed sections 374, 375, 378, 379, 380 and 387 of the CLT concerning special conditions and duration of employment for women. And more could not be done to avoid any infringement of Convention No. 89. Meanwhile, the federal Government had already submitted to the National Congress Convention No. 171 which eliminated certain restrictions on the employment of women contained in Convention No. 89. In addition, the President of the Republic proposed to the National Congress in Speech No. 345 of 22 June 1993, the withdrawal of reservations made by the Brazilian Government with regard to the United Nations Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women, ratified by Brazil on 31 March 1983. This proposal received a favourable opinion from the Congressional Committee and should soon be submitted for final vote in the Plenary. Brazil had maintained for some time a coherent policy regarding discrimination on the basis of race or sex. In addition to the constitutional and other legislative provisions cited, he pointed to the ratification by Brazil of the Convention on the Political Rights of Women (UN – 1953) and the Convention on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination (UN – 1966).

With regard to concrete measures for the effective application of constitutional international and ordinary legislation, it was appropriate to emphasize the creation in 1985 of the National Council on the Rights of Women which had been demanded by women's associations, which had broad responsibilities in connection with the Legislative, Executive and Judicial Branches. Already in 1983 some state and municipal councils had been established to act in their respective geographical areas. In 1989, the National Forum of Council Presidents was established, and since then centres providing legal advice to women, police stations specialized in dealing with offences against women, shelters for needy women and courses on the rights of women had multiplied. Another practical and important measure was the adoption of the Comprehensive Women's Health Programme formerly established in 1986 as a part of the National Social Security Institute, which had since been incorporated into the Ministry of Health. He also highlighted the creation by the current federal Government of the National Committee for the Participation of Brazil in the Fourth World Conference on Women, through the Decree of 8 December 1993. This Committee, chaired by the Ministry for Foreign Affairs, was comprised of the National Council for the Rights of Women, various Ministries, the Attorney-General of the Republic and by the Presidents of State Councils on the Rights of Women. In addition to these bodies, because of legal questions connected to the condition of women in Brazilian society, a representative of the Judicial Branch appointed by the President of the Federal Supreme Court was also included on the National Committee. At the state level, in order to combat discrimination against women, the Government of the State of São Paulo, through the State Council on Women, inspired by the UN Convention, established in 1992 the São Paulo Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination Against Women, which established specific objectives for state and municipal action in each of the social areas (health, education, child care, employment and prevention of violence). With reference to other measures, he said that the National Bank for Economic and Social Development (BNDES), which is linked to the Ministry of Planning, had accepted a request from the National Council on the Rights of Women (CNDN) that loans be denied to enterprises that did not comply with the law on the installation or operation of nurseries. In some States women's associations worked together with the appropriate regional units of the Ministry of Labour in investigating reports of complaints regarding the employment of women. Jobs for women in police forces were rapidly increasing in many States through the creation of such positions by their respective Governments. Bill No. 229/91, referred to in the report of the Committee of Experts, was designed to make explicit that which was already implicit in the existing legal system. It prohibited employers from requiring certificates of sterility or examinations to determine whether female candidates for employment were pregnant. This Bill was already approved by the Committee on Public Service and Administration and by the Committee on the Constitution and on Justice of the Chamber of Deputies, and was now in the final stage of adoption by the National Congress. Many Bills, including those of interest to workers, had been rather slow in completing procedures in the National Congress, but it was necessary to consider that in the past two years the Legislative Branch had given full priority to the Parliamentary Investigations that resulted in the impeachment of the former President of the Republic and the loss of mandate by a number of Members of Parliament. Nevertheless, the discussion of constitutional reform was a great example for the world of the dynamic democracy that existed in Brazil. Evidently, all of these events delayed the adoption of Bills submitted to Congress.

With regard to wage inequalities, he drew a distinction between two situations: (a) inequality of wages for work of equal value, which was not legally permitted; (b) different wage levels resulting from difficulties encountered by women and Black persons in obtaining promotions and, hence, higher wages. With respect to the second case the matter was related above all to occupational training. The truth of this was evident in that Blacks and women who completed higher level or technical education were prominent in Parliament, in the judiciary, in the teaching profession and in other respected activities and also held positions of responsibility in the public administration and private enterprises. In federal departments where women, Blacks and persons of mixed race had reached a high level of cultural training, inequalities in salary were becoming less marked, although the situation remained unsatisfactory in rural areas. However, while in this macro-dimension there were wage inequalities, he emphasized that this problem did not only occur in Brazil. The ILO itself had compiled statistics and carried out studies on this subject and reached the conclusion that "the higher the employment level, the bigger the gap between men and women" (Labour, No. 2, 1993). Official technical schools and occupational training courses of SENAI, SENAC, SENAT and SENAR were open to men and women without distinction as to race or colour, and in order to implement article 7, XX of the Constitution, Bills Nos. 45/91 and 52/91, establishing the Fund for the Occupational Training of Women under the Minister of Labour, which will be administered by a Council with joint representation by the Public Branch and Women's Associations, were submitted to the Chamber of Deputies. With regard to the assumption that there should be equal wages for work of equal value, the CLT said: "Section 461. Where the duties performed are identical, equal wages shall be paid, irrespective of sex, nationality or age, for all work of equal value, performed for the same employer in the same locality." In Brazil observance of the rights of workers was enforced by tribunals which comprised the System of Labour Justice on the basis of complaints presented by the person in question or the trade union representing that person. This system of labour courts was part of the Judicial Branch, staffed by judges appointed for life and by representatives of employers and workers, and thus constituted tripartism within the System of Labour Justice. A few statistics were sufficient to demonstrate the scope of this system in Brazil: there were 1,094 boards of conciliation and decision making, 25 regional labour tribunals, and a Superior Labour Tribunal. These judicial bodies received 1,799,972 complaints in 1992 and 913,109 complaints in the first six months of 1993. Many of these complaints called for a judgment with regard to a matter concerning equal pay for work of equal value. It was clear that in Brazil there existed a national policy characterised by imperative legal standards and practical measures against discrimination on the basis of race or sex. This policy involved not only public institutions but also a number of private entities. The Brazilian continent, where developed regions existed side by side with developing regions and underdeveloped regions had an economically active population of 64 million, with more than 40 million workers in formal or informal employment. Of these, 35.4 per cent were women. Today, 40 per cent of the female population was economically active. This was one of the highest levels in South America. The growth in participation of women in employment between 1970 and 1990 was 180 per cent, a substantial figure, while the growth rate for men was 71 per cent. For this reason, the rare cases of discrimination must be considered in the context of these numbers. With regard to trade unionism, 25.6 per cent of the members of trade unions were women.

He clarified that in relation to the national policy mentioned above, the Brazilian Congress had established a Parliamentary Inquiry Committee made up of 30 members. Three senators and ten deputies on this Committee were women and it was chaired by a deputy from the Workers' Party, Ms. Benedita da Silva. In its second report of 1993, the above Parliamentary Committee proposed to the federal Government a coherent national policy with regard to this matter, and made concrete suggestions to various Ministries, the Federal Public Ministry and the Federal Medical Council. With respect to the Ministry of Labour, it notified the Parliamentary Committee of the creation of the Secretariat of Safety and Health in the Workplace (SST), a permanent programme for mobilization in the defence of the health and the rights of women workers. The Parliamentary Committee concluded that the sterilization of women occurred above all in relation to the activities of the Centre for Research on Comprehensive Assistance to Women and Children, and the Civil Society for the Welfare of the Family in Brazil, which "basically operated with international funding", in addition to some private national funding. However, the work of both bodies was intended to reduce the natural population growth and not to exercise any influence over the recruitment of women for employment, as their purpose was to promote family planning. In view of the above, it did not seem accurate to generalize conclusions on the basis of a very few cases which, once they had been made known and complaints had been received, were immediately investigated by the competent authorities. According to the latest report of the National Employment Inspectorate, in 1993 there were only eight complaints which made reference to discrimination against women in employment. With regard to the Ministry of Justice, only two complaints had been received referring to racial discrimination. The first cases were brought to the Labour Ministry of the States of Bahia and Parana, and an investigation was carried out. With regard to the investigation of the complaint in the latter State, submitted by the Business Employees' Trade Union of Maringa, the matter had already been concluded by the Labour Inspectorate. It concerned an advertisement published in a newspaper by the enterprise Mitsubishi Motors whose purpose was to recruit workers of Japanese extraction, but this advertisement published on 31 March 1994 was corrected by dropping the discriminatory reference on 4 April 1994, four days before the Union filed its complaint. He stressed that Brazilian trade unions, federations, confederations and workers' centrals enjoyed both unquestioned independence and a prohibition against any interference or intervention by the Government (Constitution, article 8, No. 1). If there were no more complaints than these it was because the problem of discrimination was not as extensive as had been suggested. The Brazilian Office of the Attorney-General, which was responsible for federal prosecutions as provided by law and under the Act on civil investigation and civil public action for the protection of the public and social heritage, the environment and other various and collective interests (Constitution, article 129, Nos. I and III), in the defence of public order, the democratic system and essential social and individual interests (Constitution, article 127), had acted in a manner which was entirely independent and praiseworthy in quickly investigating the complaints on this subject. Between 1990 and 1991, the Regional Labour Prosecutor's Office of the second region (São Paulo), instituted a civil public investigation following newspaper reports of a requirement concerning 12 enterprises in the State of São Paulo that had required certificates of sterility as a condition of employment of women. These included a number of multinational enterprises of Swedish, Dutch and US origin. The prosecutor responsible for the investigation reached the conclusion that the enterprises investigated did hire women of child-bearing age, with no condition for employment dependent upon this requirement or a certificate stating that the woman was not pregnant. The table attached to the report of the Prosecutor of the Public Ministry of Labour showed that the enterprises that were investigated employed a great number of women of child-bearing age, many of whom were married in the two years preceding the investigation. Many employers, directly or through trade union organizations, quite far from discriminating against women in employment, had reached agreements or collective accords with the appropriate workers' trade unions, extending the employment security of pregnant women to six months following the end of maternity leave, and also guaranteeing the employment of the father until 90 days following delivery of the child, with the right to maternity leave extended to adoptive mothers, and the right to nursing breaks during the working day extended to nine months. No country was exempt from the risk that there might occur illegal or criminal acts. It was essential that state institutions be capable of prosecuting those who breached ratified agreements and national laws and that there be national campaigns with citizen participation to ensure respect for fundamental human rights. The Government representative concluded by pointing out that the Government had wished to respond to all of the comments of the Committee of Experts in a concrete manner.

The Workers' members said they were bothered by the approach used by the Government representative and stated that the Government representative was deliberately distracting this Committee with a great deal of lengthy information, while the questions in the observation remained unanswered in the terms raised. In addition, the information provided was to the effect that no discrimination presently existed nor had existed at any previous time, which was not the position of the Government before this Committee last year. Whereas last year a Workers' member of Brazil had confirmed before this Committee that many employers in that country were requiring women to present them with certificates of sterilization or to submit to gynaecological examinations as a condition for employment, this year the Government representative insisted that this was not occurring, and that if it were, such conduct would be contrary to the Constitution. With regard to legislation before Parliament prohibiting such requirements by employers, they were sceptical that it would ever be adopted, in view of the lengthy delays that had occurred. Moreover, they emphasized that a lack of complaints and prosecutions under legislation prohibiting discrimination in employment matters did not mean that such discrimination was not occurring. Despite the large amount of information provided by the Government representative, they were singularly unconvinced that the problems addressed by the Committee of Experts in its observation had been resolved. In particular, they asked for information in the next report on measures taken to promote the employment of women at all levels and to remedy differences in the wages of men and women workers. They also asked that every possible effort be made to adopt the Bill making it explicitly illegal for employers to require that women produce certificates of sterilization, or submit to gynaecological examinations as a condition of employment, and that a detailed report be supplied responding in particular to the request in the observation of the Committee of Experts for specific comments on the communications from the Trade Union of Bank Employees of Florianopolis and Regiao and by the Unique Workers' Central with regard to discrimination on the basis of race and racial inequalities in the labour market and in employment.

The Employers' members were surprised at the contrast between the declarations made by Government representatives before this Committee during the past two years. Last year this Committee was informed about the impending adoption of legislation such as that prohibiting employers from requiring proof of sterilization of women employees and discrimination with regard to wages on the basis of sex. This year the basic thrust of the declaration of the Government representative was that the Constitution prohibited most of the discrimination referred to in the observation of the Committee of Experts, while many labour and employment laws applied these and other related matters. They were not in a position to assess whether this was correct, as it was more properly the role of the Committee of Experts to analyse the legislation to determine whether it complied with the Convention. Another apparent contradiction was that it had appeared that there was no effective system to enforce the application of laws against discrimination in employment, and yet now it was indicated to this Committee, perhaps because of problems of interpretation, that in this country of 40,000,000 workers there were 900,000 complaints before the tribunals regarding employment discrimination matters. In view of the difference between the observation of the Committee of Experts and the information provided by the Government representative before this Committee this year, they suggested that the Government should ask the ILO for technical assistance so that a clear picture of the situation could be obtained. They also noted that under the Convention, there must be no discrimination against women who apply for higher-paying jobs so that they must resort to lower-paying jobs. A national policy promoting equal opportunities and treatment in employment was needed to address such problems. They concluded by joining in the request of the Workers' members that legislation be adopted in compliance with all provisions of the Convention.

The Government member of the United States of America stated that she was particularly concerned about the sterilization of women required by employers as referred to in the observation of the Committee of Experts. She noted that in the past a Government representative had recognized that this problem did exist, but she was not surprised at the lack of complaints made by women regarding sterilization requirements by employers, because to raise such an intensely personal matter publicly would be humiliating, and reprisals might be feared. She stressed that the Government should take active measures to pass legislation prohibiting this practice, ensure appropriate sanctions and enforcement, and provide information and education on a large scale to counteract entrenched discriminatory attitudes. In order for the legislation and practice to be brought into compliance with the Convention, she proposed that the Government request the technical assistance of the ILO to supplement all of the existing mechanisms described by the Government representative in his declaration.

The Government representative, responding to previous speakers, reiterated that the statement of the Government representative of Brazil in 1993 had been in general terms and imprecise, referring to discrimination in employment whose origins went as far back as the colonial era and to the existence of the problem, but also recognizing that he was not aware of complaints. He regretted that based on these inferences, statements had been made that did not correspond to reality, as could be proven by the information which he had given in his first statement and that were contained in the annexes made available to the Office. He stated that when there had been complaints with regard to problems concerning sterilization and other problems raised by the Committee, the labour inspectorate of the Public Ministry had begun the appropriate investigation; there were prosecutions under way and others which had not finished. The system functioned effectively to the extent that there were complaints which were instigated. For instance, as he had already pointed out, according to investigations made by the Regional Public Prosecutor of Labour in cases concerning some enterprises in São Paulo, measures that were applied concerned family planning; but at no time were sterility certificates required for employment. In this respect, the legislation in force prohibited discrimination in employment based on sex or on maternity, which covered the problems concerning sterilization that had been raised, which also was covered by the Penal Code. Therefore, the draft legislation referred to by the Committee of Experts, which in particular provided for penalties to be imposed on those employers who required sterilization certificates, was not indispensable although the Government agreed to make changes to the law. In effect, the Government supported the Bill and the interest and support of Congress in approving it could be appreciated, in that it had already been approved by two Parliamentary Committees. However, the Government representative explained that based on the principle of separation of powers and the independence of Congress, as a Government representative he could not guarantee the adoption of the Bill on a specific date. In this regard he pointed out that recently Congress had concentrated on the impeachment procedure against the previous President of the Republic, and that this procedure paralysed the activities of the Legislative Branch which in addition previously had to carry out other investigations against Senators and deputies (these gave rise to prosecutions which in turn gave rise to loss of mandate and even criminal prosecutions). This explained delays in the adoption of Bills before the National Congress. The Government representative stated that he hoped that the Bill referred to by the Committee of Experts would become law next year. Responding to one of the questions of the Employers' members on statistics, the Government representative specified that the number of cases submitted to the Labour Tribunals (which in Brazil had employer and worker representation) did not refer only to women but to all prosecutions. With regard to Convention No. 100, the Government representative indicated that the Labour Court system applied it as section 461 of the CLT reproduced the contents of the Convention; however, he indicated that he did not have statistics on wage differentials between male and female employment, but that he would ensure that the Government in its next report would provide this information to the Committee of Experts. Finally, the Government representative specified that on 19 and 20 May 1994, the Labour Ministry received an ILO technical mission which offered its assistance and that this was accepted by the Ministry in order to improve as much as possible national legislation concerning the matters covered by Convention No. 111.

The Committee noted the detailed information and explanations furnished by the Government representatives and the discussion which took place. It noted, like the Committee of Experts, that serious discrepancies still existed in law and in practice with the requirements of the Convention. The Committee noted that legislative measures were in the process of being prepared, and expressed the firm hope that they would be adopted and implemented in the very near future. However, the Committee keenly regretted that Bill No. 229 of 1991 prohibiting employers from requiring a sterilization certificate or a medical certificate attesting absence of pregnancy had still not been adopted. The Committee trusted that this Bill would be adopted and implemented in the near future. It accordingly urged the Government to take the necessary decisions to this effect. Furthermore, the Committee noted that important differences in wages continued to exist to the detriment of women and Blacks particularly in the rural sectors. It requested the Government to take all the necessary measures to ensure the full implementation of the provisions of the Convention. The Committee hoped that its next report would furnish comprehensive and detailed information so that it might be able to conclude in the very near future that substantial progress had been made in law and in practice. It recalled the possibility of having recourse to the technical assistance of the International Labour Office.

The Government representative stated that he did not agree with the phrase "serious discrepancies between legislation and practice and the requirements of the Convention" in the conclusions of this Committee, as this was not certain, as demonstrated by his previous declarations. He added that he did not agree that this Committee take note in its conclusions of significant differences in wages for women and Blacks as these differences resulted from different occupational training. Equal wages were guaranteed for equal work. The situation should not be prejudged before the Committee of Experts had examined this case in all its aspects. He considered that the conclusions did not correspond to the real situation in Brazil nor did they emerge from the discussion which had taken place. In this regard, he considered that he had been speaking in the wilderness.

The Committee took note of the statements of the Government representative.

Cuba (ratification: 1965). The Government has communicated the following information:

The Government considers that the Committee of Experts should evaluate the present information in the wider context of changes in the structure and the functioning of the central administrative bodies of the State, in the framework of the reforms introduced to the Constitution of the Republic. On 21.04.1994, Decree-Law No. 147 was adopted which provides for the reorganization of the central bodies of the State, to adapt them to the conditions of the present special period, as well as to the international exchange and collaboration which the country is developing in the actual international circumstances. According to the above Decree-Law, a great number of central administrative bodies of the State will disappear and their functions will be transferred to others. The heads of these bodies shall present, within 90 days, proposals to a committee created within the Council of Ministers, dealing with the organization and functions of the new bodies. This committee shall take the necessary decisions not more than one year later. This process of institutional and economic reorganization of the country, of simplification and rationalization of the State apparatus, including the decentralization of the foreign trade and the increased financial and operative autonomy of the enterprises passes into the economic plan through an ensemble of measures which will be adopted at the same time in a gradual and cautious manner.

With respect to the different paragraphs of the observation, the Government provides the following indications:

1. An example of the new form for the students' accumulated records is appended; it is being printed and will be used from the next school course onwards. The actual forms have been modified according to a circular letter of the Ministry of Education, dated 06.02.1993, to eliminate the data that were irrelevant to the educational process and which were the subject of the Committee of Experts' observations. These data have also been eliminated from the new form.

2. Resolution No. 590 of 1980 has been repealed completely by Resolution No. 1 of 1993 which provides for the withdrawal from the workers' records of the information required by Resolution No. 590. Section 3 of Resolution No. 1 of 1993, while mentioning that the procedure to follow for the recognition of a praiseworthy attitude of a worker will continue to be the responsibility of the trade union movement if it deems it useful and in accordance with its working methods, refers to production or branch assemblies which are periodically summoned by the trade unions in every work unit. In the Cuban system of labour relations the trade unions participate in the control and the evaluation of the fulfilment of the work plan of the work unit, according to its structural organization, whether at the level of the departments, workshops, etc. In these assemblies, on the basis of the report which the administration presents on the state of fulfilment of the previously agreed workplan, those workers will be mentioned who have distinguished themselves for their efficiency, punctuality and the quality of their work results in relation to the individual and collective performance. This is a trade union activity where the Cuban workers have an opportunity to express themselves and which relates to a public recognition that stimulates a good worker and has no relationship with the provisions of this Convention. Furthermore, the Government assures that since Resolution 590 has been repealed, which was the subject of comments of the Committee of Experts, no control on the elements that have been the subject of the observation has been exercised in the workers' records. A new form of the work records is appended.

3. With respect to the dismissal of 14 university professors some years ago, Decree-Law No. 34 of 1980 has been applied which provides that dismissal from the duties of a teacher in higher education may be decided by university deans and may be challenged before the Ministry of Higher Education. In the present case the concerned teachers had, at that time, lost their status of university teachers, but not their work relationship with the Ministry of Higher Education. They have all been offered new jobs and they have voluntarily decided not to accept them.

4. As far as the regulation of the system of inspection of the Ministry of Education is concerned, the Government has indicated that the entire school inspection system is in a process of change and has to adjust to the provisions of Decree-Law No. 147 of 1994, respecting the reorganization of the bodies of the central State administration. The inspectorate of the Ministry of Education will give advice, direct the methodological orientation and the general and special State supervision, through systematic exchanges with the different departments and centres of education. The political elements mentioned in these paragraphs refer to the policy of the educational system and not to the elements prohibited in the Convention. Decree-Law No. 34 of 1980 is also being revised and modified according to the terms of the provisions of Decree-Law No. 147 of 1994, respecting the reorganization of the bodies of the central State administration. Resolution No. 2 of 1989, respecting the rehabilitation of workers to whom Decree-Law No. 34 has been applied, provides for the possibility of reducing the term to a period of less than five years for such rehabilitation.

Evaluation of workers

5. Resolution No. 50 of 1987 has been repealed by Resolution No. 17 of 1993, which has eliminated the elements which were considered incompatible with the Convention. The text of Resolution No. 17 of 1993 will be transmitted with the next report.

Access to training

6. As admitted by the Committee of Experts, the criteria for admission to higher education depend on the qualifications that the candidates have demonstrated in evaluation tests, based on the academic index of the student, which is in turn determined by examinations. Consultation of the above and of the students' collective has no connection with the criteria prohibited under the Convention. It is part of a work style of wide participation in the teaching institutions, to guarantee the functioning of the teaching institution, to analyse the success and defects of the organization and of the school management with respect to the execution of school programmes.

Access to employment

7. Revision of internal regulations of some enterprises has been concluded and, as pointed out in a previous report, some cases indicated by the Committee of Experts had already been modified before the revision was undertaken. In pursuing the revision, the labour inspectorate has suggested not to include in future regulations elements which might lead to erroneous interpretations or which would lead away from the principle of equality in employment, as provided for in section 3 of the Labour Code which directs the employment policy of the country and says literally: "Every citizen able to work has, without distinction as to race, colour, sex, religion, political opinion or national or social origin, the opportunity to obtain an employment through which he may contribute to the ends of society and to the satisfaction of his necessities".

8. The content of the workers' records has been modified factually and in law, with respect to the provisions of Resolution No. 1 of 1993 repealing Resolution No. 590 which was the subject of comments of the Committee of Experts. The new Resolution provides that the forms in which the merits of workers are inscribed have to be withdrawn. The new form of workers' record, appended hereto, does not contain any element in contradiction with the Convention.

9. The posts of the State administration correspond with the criteria expressed by the Committee of Experts in its General Survey, referring to high-level posts related to Government policy. The Government notes the paragraph mentioned in the General Survey of the Committee of Experts.

In addition, a Government representative added some general remarks to supplement the written information furnished to the Committee. She noted that since 1991, when this case was first discussed at the Committee, important modifications to the legislation and to the practice took place with regard to the application of the Convention. She referred to the repeal of Resolution No. 590, which had been noted as a case of progress in paragraph 135 of the general report of the Committee of Experts with regard to Convention No. 29, and considered that this should be seen in the same manner with regard to Convention No. 111, since an important change had been introduced to the contents of the labour records following a request of the Committee of Experts; in the new labour records, the elements recorded under Resolution No. 590 were eliminated. She also indicated that, in the new form for the student's accumulated school record, information that was unnecessary to the educational process was eliminated and that the repeal of Resolution No. 50 of 1987 regarding the evaluation of the work of journalists, together with the adoption of new provisions, complied with the request of the Committee of Experts. The speaker further indicated that other measures had been carried out, relating to labour inspection in the plan of investigations and to a correct application of the provisions that had a bearing on the Convention, so as to avoid erroneous interpretations that did not correspond to the principles of equality expressed in the Constitution of the Republic and in the Labour Code. The labour legislation should be adapted to the changes in the structure and the functioning of the organisms of the State Central Administration.

She concluded by confirming the Government's willingness, already expressed on different occasions, to modify the legislation, according to the necessities and to the particularities of social and economic transformations, taking account of ratified international Conventions.

The Workers' members thanked the Government representative for providing very detailed oral and written information. The written information made the point that the Committee of Experts needed to evaluate the present information in the context of changes taking place. On 21 April 1994, Decree Law No. 147 was adopted which provided for the reorganization of virtually all central bodies to adapt them to present social conditions. To the extent that the changes affected the application of any Convention that has been ratified by Cuba, the Government should transmit details of how they are affected to the Committee of Experts. Resolution No. 590 of 1980, which established merits and demerits on workers' records based on political views, has been repealed by Resolution No. 1 of 1993. Since this was the concern of the Committee of Experts and since it has been done away with, the Conference Committee need not concern itself with this. The dismissal of the 14 university professors was quite serious. It was alleged that the professors were dismissed because of their political views. The Government has maintained that the grounds for dismissal were different, but the Committee of Experts has not been given information on the reasons. In addition, there was no provision in national legislation to provide for tribunals or access to law for the professors to appeal. More information should be given by the Government concerning this in their next report. The Government has indicated that the entire school inspection system was in the process of change and must be adjusted to the provisions of Decree Law No. 147 of 1994. The Committee of Experts required detailed information on this. The Government informed the Committee of Experts that it intended to make amendments to bring the texts into line with the changed circumstances, and the Committee of Experts' comments would be taken into account. Concerning access to training, the Committee of Experts was satisfied that candidates were now being evaluated entirely on the basis of their academic record. The Committee of Experts was also concerned about the students' collective and trade union involvement and the Workers' members requested more information about this in the next report. Concerning access to employment, they noted that the revision of the internal regulations had been concluded. In carrying this out, labour inspectors suggested not to include in future regulations elements which might lead to erroneous interpretations or which led away from the principle of equality in employment as provided for in section 3 of the Labour Code. They requested the Committee of Experts to investigate this in detail. The point about the journalists had been cleared up, and this too could be examined by the Committee of Experts. Also, the new form for workers' records did not contain anything in contradiction with the Convention. A final point concerned posts in the state administration. If these were very senior posts, very top level posts like government advisors, in which a person must hold certain political views, then it may be acceptable. But if this requirement continued right down through the state administration, it was unacceptable. The Workers' members felt paragraph 9 of the written information did not offer any useful information. It stated that posts in the state administration corresponded to the criteria expressed by the Committee of Experts in its General Survey. The paragraph gave no indication as to whether the Government was taking account of those comments. They concluded by expressing the feeling that much progress had been made, but that not everything had been resolved. The points must be examined by the Committee of Experts and, in particular, the changes to be introduced consequent to Decree Law No. 147.

The Employers' members, while welcoming the positive indications in the report, were more concerned and more critical than the Workers' members. It was useful to define exactly what was at issue. This case concerned a number of different legislative and regulatory practices that resulted in discrimination based on political opinion which was contrary to Convention No. 111. The Committee of Experts noted that guidelines for the use of student records for teachers were a positive development. The Employers' members were concerned that, while much has occurred, it was not clear that the measure would result in meaningful concrete changes relating to full implementation of and compliance with Convention No. 111. Decree Law No. 147 provided for a general reorganization of administrative bodies and law in practice but it was unclear how this would deal specifically with the issue of political opinion discrimination. The first point in the document related to the students' accumulated records and certain data being eliminated from the new form. They suggested that the Committee of Experts review this. Point 2, concerning merits and demerits, on the surface it appears that the changes will make this operate better. However, the Employers' members had some doubts given that the Conference Committee had dealt for a number of years with the issue of trade union monopoly in Cuba. This may simply be another way of avoiding compliance with Convention No. 111. Point 3 dealt with the dismissal of the 14 university professors, and the last sentence noted that they had been offered new jobs which they refused. The important point is that the professors had no opportunity to appeal the dismissal in front of an administrative or judicial body. The Employers' members felt much more needed to be done on this point. Point 4 dealt with the school inspection system. The Government noted this was in a process of change, and the political elements mentioned referred to the policy of the educational system. This appeared to be an improvement but it must continue to be monitored. They pointed out that there were a number of other issues they wished to address, but there was simply not enough information on, for example, workers' access to training and to employment. It was hoped that the Committee of Experts would provide a helpful analysis. The Employers' members concluded by stating that the central concerns of the Conference Committee – the moral requirements that must be taken into account in a whole variety of employment circumstances – still remain in play. They requested the Committee of Experts to examine the information supplied by the Government in detail and to indicate whether the legal and practical situation in Cuba was demonstrating better compliance with the Convention. They urged that the conclusions be firmer than those of 1992. While they recognized there had been some progress, the Government had much more to do to bring its law and practice into line with the requirements of Convention No. 111.

A Workers' member of Colombia appealed to the Cuban Government to intensify the work to improve the rights of Cuban workers in every sense, above all as regards the right to non-discrimination based on ideology and party membership in which they believed, according to the Committee of Experts.

The Government representative stated that she had taken note of all the concerns expressed which would be duly taken into account by her Government in future reports. Referring to the intervention of the Workers' members, she stated that the posts in the administration of the State, to which the Committee of Experts referred in paragraph 9 of its observation, did not include all posts but were limited to certain posts, such as President, Vice-President, minister, deputy minister and certain executive posts.

The Committee took note of the written information provided by the Government, as well as of the discussion which took place. With regard to conditions of employment, the Committee noted the measures taken by the Government, in particular new legislation announced in the written information. It hoped that the Government would do everything in its power to continue to harmonize the legislation with the Convention. With regard to the evaluation of workers, the Committee noted with interest the repeal of Resolution No. 50 of 1987, and it asked the Government to provide a copy of this decision with its next report and expressed the hope that all necessary measures would be taken to guarantee, in law and in practice, the full application of the Convention. With regard to access to training and employment, the Committee expressed the strong hope that the Government would be able to indicate in its next report considerable progress in the application of the Convention. In general, the Committee would like the Government to continue to provide complete and detailed information on all the questions raised by the Committee of Experts in order to allow it to assess the constant evolution of the situation in law and in practice.

Romania (ratification: 1973). The Government supplied the following information:

Discrimination based on national ancestry, race or social origin. A draft Act respecting the protection of national minorities which was recently submitted to Parliament will regulate the status of minorities on the basis of the constitution. Furthermore, the Government has sent the text of Government Decision No. 461 and a publication of the Council for Minorities entitled The Legislative and Institutional Framework for the National Minorities of Rumania. With respect to article 2 of Decision No. 136 (and not 137, as erroneously quoted in the Direct Request) of 6 April 1993, the representatives of the Democratic Magyar Union of Romania, of the Democratic Forum of Germans of Romania, the Democratic Union of the Roma, as well as the representatives of nine other organizations of minorities (Armenians, Bulgarians, Greeks, etc.) are part of the Council. Over 1.1 billion Lei are earmarked to subsidize the activities of the Council of Minorities.

The actions before the judicial instances, taken by persons who have suffered from imprisonment or from prosecution for political reasons have been resolved through decisions of the Supreme Court of Justice. Decisions No. 1048 to 1059, respecting the cases of Micu Stefan, Boeriu Petru Marius, Stefanescu Ion, Anghel Darie, Nicuta Paraschiv, Cojocea Nicusor, Puscasu Enea, Broasca Dumitru, Dascalu Petrica, Muresan Vasile, Vitos Lodovic and Vieru Angelica who had been accused of "public acts of indecency" during the incidents directed against the political régime that occurred in the town of Brasov in 1987 provide for material and moral compensation. These decisions have been executed in conformity with Act No. 118/1990. The issuing of titles for landed property to the former owners is continuing according to Act No. 18/1991, without any discrimination. The process is rather slow because of numerous problems concerning heirs and successions. At the end of May of this year, out of a total of an estimated 4,416,692 cases, only 970,737 (22 per cent) of the property titles had been delivered. Since the last report, no complaint has been lodged with the authorities alleging any infringement of recommendations Nos. 4, 6 and 7 of the Commission of Inquiry or of Act No. 118/1990 respecting the granting of rights to persons who have been prosecuted for political reasons. In 1993 the Government has, as it had announced to the Committee of Experts in May 1993, distributed the text of the report of the Commission of Inquiry to the national organizations of workers and employers. This year, it has been distributed to the National Public Prosecutor of Romania, to the Ministry of Justice and the Ministry of Tuition.

Situation of female workers. The unemployment rate has risen from 9.3 per cent (May 1993) to 11 per cent (May 1994); it stands at 13 per cent for women, compared with 9 per cent for men. One third of secondary-school graduates and 50 per cent of university graduates are jobless. 67.4 per cent of female unemployed are between 15 and 24 years of age. 59 per cent of long term unemployed are women. The branches of the economy in which women are most vulnerable are construction and the mechanical, chemical and electrical engineering industries. The authorities did not have to deal with any cases of discrimination, based on sex, in the access to programmes of occupational training. The restructuring of the economy continues to have a negative effect on the level to which job requests can be satisfied (only 30 per cent). Actually, the Government is developing part-time work to the widest possible extent (flexible hours, job sharing, etc.), especially with regard to women. A national committee has been set up to prepare the participation of the Romanian delegation in the Fourth World Conference on the Status of Women which will be held in Beijing next year. One of the major objectives of this committee is the setting up of a government structure to elaborate training programmes for women and special promotional measures for women. At the beginning of this year, UNDP and the Ministry of Labour have initiated a common project concerning "The Participation of Women in Development", which is aimed at: sensitizing public opinion to the factors that influence the situation of women; promoting strategies of equality of chances between women and men; establishing programmes for the creation of new jobs, especially in small and medium scale enterprises; developing training courses, including in the management field.

In addition, a Government representative of Romania recalled that the promotion of human rights, the cornerstone of a democratic society, had become an essential element of Romanian policy since 1989. As concerned point 8 of the observation of the Committee of Experts, although it was not possible to give specific information as to the number of persons having benefited from the provisions of Decree No. 118 of 9 April 1990 which entitled persons, who had been unable to work due to incarceration or persecution for political reasons from 6 March 1945 onwards, to be compensated in terms of years of seniority for purposes of calculating pension and other benefits, it was appropriate to state that the new legislation had been applied automatically to all persons concerned. In order to facilitate the Government's task it was desirable that the Committee of Experts mentioned the cases where a claim for compensation had not been followed up. As concerned the restitution of titles for landed property, many clarifications needed to be made. First of all when they had furnished proof of their ownership rights former owners and their heirs had their land restored to them. However, to the extent that this restitution had to be preceded by numerous measures, such as the determination of the exact size of the parcel of land and the identification of the true owners, the issuance of titles for property was a complex process. Furthermore, in the event of a dispute the case was taken to the courts and the Government could not intervene to accelerate the process. Finally, the restitution of land had to be carried out in conformity with laws respecting landed property. Concerning point 9 of the observation, it was appropriate to recall that by virtue of Decree No. 118, the persons mentioned in Recommendation No. 6 of the Commission of Inquiry, including the strikers who had been reinstated by the courts, had undergone medical examination and had received subsidies from the State. With regard to Recommendation No. 7 concerning the reinstatement of workers who had lost their jobs as a result of being arrested for the June 1990 demonstrations, the Committee of Experts should draw to the Government's attention cases where the persons concerned had been refused reinstatement. In this respect it was appropriate to clarify that the employers decision to break the employment contract could not be taken until after 60 days of incarceration, in conformity with section 130 of the Labour Code. With regard to point 10 of the observation of the Committee of Experts, the speaker referred to the written information provided. In conclusion, the speaker emphasized that one had to be conscious of the difficulties resulting from the current period of economic transition.

The Workers' members recalled that the discussion on points 8, 9 and 10 of the report of the Committee of Experts had to be seen in the context of the follow-up to the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry set up under article 26 of the ILO Constitution. This Committee had insisted on the need to take specific and effective measures and to furnish detailed information to the Committee of Experts especially with respect to compensation measures. It was to be noted that the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry were taken into consideration during the constitutional and legislative reforms. However, the principal problem concerned the practical effects of the measures adopted. With regard to point 8 of the observation concerning compensation, to mention a decree and to affirm that the problems were resolved was not sufficient. What was important was to have specific and detailed information on the results achieved regarding reparations as requested by the Committee of Experts. Concerning point 9 of the observation, if one referred to the written information provided, it would appear that no claim had been lodged before the authorities for infringements of Recommendations

Nos. 4, 6 and 7 of the Commission of Inquiry. However, during last year's meeting, the Workers' member of Romania had underlined that cases of discrimination still remained notably due to the attitude of the management of enterprises who still adhered to practices and concepts of the old regime and that procedures concerning discrimination were extremely slow. It was to be wondered whether the length of the procedures and the lack of access to the courts were not at the origin of the statement that there were no complaints. If the written information supplied by the Government were to be referred to, it would appear that the text of the report of the Commission of Inquiry had been transmitted to international organizations of workers and employers. However, the question remained as to whether this information had been distributed on a sufficiently wide basis. Finally, the Workers' members wished to insist that there should be follow-up measures to the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry, that effective measures should be taken to grant compensation to victims of discrimination for political reasons and that information that was as complete as possible should be at the disposal of the Committee of Experts so that they could assess the effects in practice.

The Employers' members stated that this case had been dealt with since 1989. They felt that Law Decree No. 118 of 1990 provided a good basis for progress but that it really was a question of seeing how it was implemented in practice. In this respect, the Government representative had stated that he had no precise information but it was this information which the Committee of Experts and this Committee required. The Employers' members wanted to know how much compensation had been granted to those who were persecuted for political and other reasons and those who were deprived of their property unjustly. As concerned the issuing of titles for landed property to former owners, the Government representative pointed out that forced confiscation of land only took place during the last 11 years of the communist regime. While acknowledging the difficulties involved in restoring land and property to the original owners, the Employers' members considered that compensation should be easier to carry out here since the titles had been missing only for a period of 11 years. It seemed to them therefore that the restitution of the property titles as indicated in the written reply of the Government (22 per cent) was taking place at a rather slow pace. They felt that it should be possible to accelerate these procedures to a certain extent so that compensation was granted at a higher level than 22 per cent. Moreover, the Government representative had stated, in respect of paragraph 9 of the observation, that the Committee of Experts should inform him about specific cases which had not been remedied and that the Government would then do something about it. They considered that it was up to the Government to know where the wrong had been done and therefore how something had to be remedied. Referring to paragraph 10 of the observation which dealt with the question of the distribution of the copies of the report of the Commission of Inquiry, the Employers' members pointed out that although the Government representative had stated that the text had been distributed, he had not specified whether it had been distributed in the Romanian language. However, the Committee of Experts wanted this report to be distributed in Romanian and possibly in the languages of the ethnic minorities as well so that there was wider awareness in Romania itself on this matter. The Employers' members concluded that this discussion had shown once again that there was a long way to go in order to right the wrongs committed by the previous regime. Therefore, this case should be left open and pressure should be put on the Government once again to do everything possible to reach the results required by the Commission of Inquiry in its report.

The Workers' member of Romania, recalling that numerous cases of violations of trade union rights still existed, stated that legislation in her country on human rights including freedom of association had been adopted but shared the point of view of the Employers' and Workers' members that its implementation was difficult.

The Government representative maintained that a distinction had to be made between the problems of the past and those that followed the 1989 revolution. Regarding the past, all compensation measures had been implemented but problems of a technical nature made it difficult to obtain precise information. However, it was appropriate to specify that Romania was in the process of modernizing the administrative structure which would allow it to evaluate correctly the exact number of persons who were compensated. Concerning the future and more specifically the problem of the slowness of the procedures, proposals have been introduced in Parliament to remedy these problems. In this respect, within the framework of tripartite discussions, a reform of labour legislation and in particular, Act No. 54 of 1991 respecting trade unions was being undertaken. Finally, the speaker wished to emphasize that a book on national minorities of Romania containing vast statistical, legal and other information was at the disposal of the Committee of Experts in English and French to allow it to better assess the situation.

The Committee took note of the written information and the oral explanations provided by the Government representative, as well as the discussion that took place in the Committee. It noted the fact that a certain number of legislative measures had been adopted to ensure the application of the Convention, but nevertheless observed that the Committee of Experts had not received the information requested earlier. The Committee wished that the Government would, in the near future, adopt all necessary additional measures to implement the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry and to continue its efforts to bring law and practice into full compliance with the provisions of the Convention. It urged the Government to provide, as soon as possible, all the precise and detailed information requested by the supervisory bodies of the ILO, so that the latter could assess the situation in full knowledge of the facts and note the specific progress that had been made.

Convention No. 118: Equality of Treatment (Social Security), 1962

Iraq (ratification: 1978). A Government representative stated, with reference to the observation of the Committee of Experts, that section 38 of Act No. 39 of 1971 on Pensions and Social Security guaranteed to all those insured (Iraqis, Arabs, foreigners and residents living abroad) the payment of social security pensions and the right to benefits in the event of occupational accidents in accordance with the following rules: with regard to the Iraqis, the benefits referred to were paid if the departure from the country was legal; with regard to Arab foreigners the benefits were paid when they returned to their country once the work period had ended if they did not have heirs in Iraq; in respect of other foreigners, the benefits referred to [illegible] according to reciprocity or the provisions of international agreements, and in the best interests of the worker. These were rules of procedure applied for organizational reasons which were not in contravention with the Convention, since his country was careful to guarantee the application of the Convention in legislation and in practice. With regard to benefits owing to the workers that left Iraq in 1990, Iraq was ready to pay the benefits to the Egyptian workers as well as to other workers in the same position, once the embargo against Iraq was raised and it could export oil. The benefits in question would be paid in the context of the provisions of national legislation and international agreements: 250,000 Egyptian workers remained in Iraq as well as a large number of farm workers, and all of them enjoyed the same rights as the Iraqis, under labour legislation and international agreements.

The Employers' members recalled that this case had been dealt with last year and that the statements made by the Government were very similar to those made last year. The problem was very clear and consisted of guaranteeing equality of treatment for Iraqi nationals and foreigners with regard to social security. It was a matter of paying pensions to foreigners once they had left the country. This problem affected most of all those Egyptian workers who had abandoned Iraq in circumstances of war in 1990. The Government stated that the legislation was not contrary to the Convention, but said that the payment of the pensions would only be made if the economic and financial situation changed. Given that the State must pay the pensions, the present situation was not in conformity with the Convention. The economic embargo against Iraq could not be used as a response to the complaints of the workers, who had made contributions often for many years of work in the country. The political arguments made as a defence could not be accepted. In view of the fact that the Government representative had not given concrete answers with regard to the approach of his country in the future, that his declaration was very general and that this case was dealt with last year, the Committee should urge the Government to act so that a solution to the problem could be found as quickly as possible.

The Workers' members remembered that this case had been discussed at length last year with regard to the conformity of Act No. 39 of 1971 and of Order No. 2 of 1978 with the Convention. Last year the Government stated that it was studying the provisions in question and anxious to determine how they could best be brought into conformity with the Convention. They asked the Government if it still intended to proceed with an examination of the legislation with a view to its revision. With regard to the payment of pensions to Egyptian workers and possibly also to those of other countries, the argument could not be accepted that the delay was due to the war, to economic difficulties or to the international embargo. If the Government had the political will to comply with the Convention, it could begin negotiations so that money frozen in foreign countries could be directed towards the payment of pensions for the workers concerned. This was a worrisome situation because it affected a large number of Egyptian workers who had no resources and who had the right to their benefits. They asked that detailed information on when they would pay the pensions to the workers in question who in many cases were older persons waiting for their retirement pension.

The Government representative reiterated that his Government was prepared to pay all the social security benefits owing but the difficult economic situation caused by the economic embargo of his country and the freezing of Iraqi funds abroad made it impossible to set a date for the payment of such benefits. This economic situation did not even permit the acquisition by his country of medical supplies. However, Iraq fulfilled the obligations imposed by the United Nations Security Council, and other countries of this body had also noted the significant progress made by Iraq.

The Workers' member of Kuwait wished to answer the Government representative who had stated that the payments in question would be made as soon as the embargo was lifted and when oil sales resumed. In his view it was factually incorrect to claim that the United States was preventing such payments. This would be tantamount to questioning the legitimacy of the decisions of the international community regarding Iraq. This problem which involved Egyptian workers as well as citizens of other countries which may be Arab or not, was independent of UN resolutions and it would be inconceivable to withdraw in order to address this problem. This Committee should show firmness in order to obtain a solution as the Government has been making the same argument for many years now. Given the manner in which this Government treats its own citizens, it was not so surprising that it was refusing to pay these workers what was due to them.

The Government member of Kuwait noted the falsity of the statement made by the Government representative that his Government would respect the UN Security Council resolutions.

The Government representative of Iraq protested against this assertion dealing with matters completely outside the work of the Committee.

The Workers' member of Italy stated his belief that the United Nations embargo permitted some exceptions for food and medical supplies. In his view, the Government of Iraq could request the Security Council to partially lift and supervise the embargo to permit such payments which were required by the Convention.

The Government representative said his Government fully recognized the rights of the Egyptian workers to such payments and would be ready to make these payments as soon as the embargo was lifted and the situation in the country improved.

The Employers' members expressed their regret at not finding anything new in the statement of the Government representative which they considered to be less responsive than the ones presented to the Committee in 1992 and 1993. The Government, which had not provided a report at the time, had expressed its readiness to conform with the requests of the Committee while all along making the same reservations as today. The Committee of Experts noted in its report the Government's statement that even though the existing legislation was not contrary to the Convention, it was ready to adopt certain amendments to this effect. However, by making the right of workers regarding their payments abroad conditional on the lifting of the embargo, the Government's attitude resembled the taking of hostages because the workers' rights had nothing to do with the freezing of assets abroad. In his view this Committee should firmly condemn such behaviour.

The Workers' members noted that the Workers' member of Kuwait was justified in raising the question of sanctions imposed by the United Nations to the extent that it was the Government representative of Iraq himself who had initially raised it. In addition, as was recalled by the Workers' member from Kuwait, the origin of the problem went back to 1988, long before the imposition of sanctions. It was for this reason the Employers' members were considering this situation to be similar to hostage-taking. In its conclusions adopted last year the Committee had requested the Government to provide information that would allow the verification of Iraq's full compliance with the Convention. All the information obtained from the report of the Committee of Experts and these discussions indicated clearly that the Government was not implementing the Convention. The Committee should adopt conclusions firmly requiring the Government to fully apply the Convention by taking measures to make the said payments to the Egyptian and other workers as well as by making an undertaking to amend the legislation to put it in full conformity with the Convention.

The Committee noted the information provided by the Government representative as well as the discussion that took place in its meetings. The Committee recalled that it had discussed this problem over the last few years and regretted that this year no concrete measures had been taken to ensure that the law and practice fully applied the Convention especially as regards equal treatment in payments made abroad. The Committee expressed the very firm hope that the Government will, in the very near future, take all the concrete measures necessary to make the payments due and thus ensure the full conformity of the law and practice with the Convention it undertook to implement.

Convention No. 122: Employment Policy, 1964

Peru (ratification: 1967). The Government supplied the following information:

In its 1994 observation, the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations requested the following:

1. Detailed information on programmes implemented under the new legislation, and on the results obtained, particularly taking into account that, as the Government recognizes, these measures were limited for the time being because of the economic recession.

A. The youth labour training programme

The objective of this programme is to provide theoretical and practical knowledge of work to youths between the ages of 16-21, for the purpose of integrating them into economic activity in a specific occupation. In this way, enterprises or firms whose workers are in the private sector labour system are able to enter into Youth Labour Training agreements, which have a duration of no more than 18 months, and are not subject to the labour stability law; they also receive a financial subsidy of no less than the minimum living wage, and their numbers cannot exceed 15 per cent of the total personnel of the enterprise, including permanent employees or those under any type of contract.

The youth labour training agreement is in writing and contains the following information:

(a) name or name of firm of the individual or legal entity which sponsors the labour training;
(b) name, age and other personal information concerning the youth receiving the training;
(c) occupation that is the subject of the specific training;
(d) monthly financial subsidy amounting to no less than the minimum living wage;
(e) reasons for the amendment, suspension or termination of the agreement.

Youths that are subject to the labour training programme shall be registered in a special register, for which the enterprise is responsible, and authorized by the competent office of the Ministry of Labour and Social Development. Since its creation in October of 1990, there have been 3,596 such agreements.

B. Preoccupational internship programme

The purpose of this programme is to provide guidance and technical and occupational training to students and graduates of any age of universities and higher level institutes, either public or private, which provide specialized or higher level training in the areas corresponding to their academic training. Preoccupational internships are carried out under an occupational training agreement between the enterprise or firms whose workers are subject to the private sector labour system and the student, with the authorization of the teaching institution to which he or she belongs. The preoccupational internship agreement is in writing and made known to the competent office of the Ministry of Labour and Social Development, and the institution which is training the trainee. Similar to the youth labour training programme, the preoccupational internship programme does not establish an employment relationship, the subsidy which the enterprise grants to the trainee is not less than the minimum living wage, and as it is not remunerative in nature, it is not subject to deductions nor to any payment by the enterprise on behalf of the beneficiary for contributions to the Peruvian Social Security Institute, FONAVI, SENATI or any similar body. Since its creation in October of 1990, there have been 18,916 such agreements.

C. Independent employment and micro-enterprise programme "PRODAME"

Through this programme substantial and adequate support is granted to micro and small enterprises, as it is a sector that potentially can reactivate labour.

The objectives of the programme are:

- to stimulate the creation of sources of employment for people who are unemployed or underemployed through the formation of micro and small enterprises;
- to formalize and legalize micro and small enterprises so that they have access to economic and financial means of the formal system;
- to reduce the time for and cost of forming micro and small enterprises, by simplifying administrative procedures and the signing of Inter-Institutional Cooperation Agreements;

The following benefits are granted by the programme:

- legal advice for the formation of the micro or small enterprises;
- preparation of the constitutive document and lawyer's signature at no cost;
- 50 per cent discount of the notary's tariff, under an agreement with the College of Notaries;
- advice on obtaining its unified registration;

Since its creation in November 1990, PRODAME succeeded in forming 3,371 new economic entities, 41.2 per cent in the commercial sector, 33.6 per cent in the service sector and 25.2 per cent in industrial activities.

2. Information on measures taken to collect statistical data on not only the urban but also the rural and national labour markets, which are necessary, as Recommendation No. 122 recalls, as a basis for the general and specific measures to be taken in the framework of employment policy.

Statistical data on the labour market is obtained through inquiries carried out by the Minister of Labour and Social Development which include the following: domestic inquiry, wages and salaries inquiry, and monthly variation in employment inquiry.

Domestic inquiry

The objective of this inquiry is to gain information on developments and trends regarding the labour force through basic characteristics such as: levels of employment, income, occupational groups and categories, areas of economic activity, education, migration, principal characteristics of the urban informal sector, information on the structure of the economically active population by areas of residence, and other information referred to on the use of labour. This inquiry is carried out at the level of Metropolitan Lima in a sampling of approximately 2,000 homes, involving interviews with about 6,000 persons aged over 14. Geographic coverage includes the area of Metropolitan Lima, whose framework for sampling includes 48 districts constituting the Province of Lima and the Constitutional Province of Callao. The fulfilment of the domestic inquiry has been programmed for the national level, as the first phase has already been carried out at the level of the 13 principal cities of the country, comprising the "Updating of the Sampling Framework".

Monthly variation inquiry

The purpose of this inquiry is to determine trends in changes in the demand for labour in three sectors of the economy: industry, commerce, and services, and to determine the causes of increases or decreases in the number of workers as well as the effect of specific legal provisions relating to employment. This study comprises a survey of all enterprises employing more than 100 workers in the manufacturing, commercial and services sectors of Metropolitan Lima: it is carried out on a monthly basis by sending inquiry forms to the enterprises through the Postal Service.

Salaries and wages inquiry

This inquiry obtains information about trends in nominal and actual salaries and wages, to determine the purchasing power of remuneration, the trends and distribution in respect of occupational groups and categories, the extent to which workers are subject to collective bargaining, shift work and hours of work, as well as the characteristics of workers. This study is carried out on a bi-monthly basis and involves about 550 enterprises, with information collected from approximately 5,000 workers, including executives, employees and labourers. The coverage of the sampling framework for enterprises includes all private enterprises employing ten or more workers who annually submit their payrolls to the Ministry of Labour and Social Development, at the level of Metropolitan Lima.

3. Information on regional, social and economic plans and programmes to promote employment as well as on the situation, levels and trends in employment in the other departments of the Republic.

With regard to regional socio-economic plans and programmes for employment promotion, a "public employment service programme" has been prepared. This programme was prepared to decentralize intermediary labour market programmes at the level of the principal cities of the country, under programmes to increase employment and as part of the labour market regulation policy.

Some of the principal objectives are:

- to implement a quick computerized system for managing employment in the Regional Labour and Social Development Administrations, through the "Integrated Employment Management System of Peru";
- to establish an integrated system to act as an intermediary in the labour market at the national level, seeking to maximise the hiring of workers through interrelationships among the placement offices at the national level;
- to provide an intermediary service for offering and requesting employment in order to place the worker requiring a job suited to his aptitude, ability and knowledge with employers requiring such workers in order to fill given vacancies;
- to provide guidance to future and present workers in order to achieve the best use of their aptitudes and abilities in an occupation;
- to study the structures and characteristics of the labour market, for the purpose of using this information for the guidance and better employment of the labour force.

With reference to the circumstances, levels and trends in employment in the remaining departments of the Republic, it is to be noted that information on this matter will be obtained through the domestic inquiry at the national level in 1994, as this had not been carried out in previous years because of budgetary restrictions.

4. Information on how representatives of the persons affected, particularly representatives of employers and workers, are consulted on employment policy, indicating, in particular, whether such consultations are extended to representatives of other sectors of the economically active population, such as the rural and informal sectors.

Within the framework of employment policy, an evaluation is being carried out of programmes that have been developed, taking into account the opinions of the beneficiaries of the programmes, for the purpose of proposing necessary measures.

In addition, a Government representative stated that, for well-known reasons of terrorism and drug trafficking, which forced many farmers to move to safer areas, it had not been possible to compile more complete information on the rural sector, notwithstanding the fact that in October 1993 all the regions of the Republic were sent directives on promotion of employment and vocational education, as well as forms for the compilation of statistical data so that the central Government could centralize and analyse this information and subsequently take the most suitable decisions for each region. Some regional governments in their internal organizational structure in the labour and welfare sector had omitted to include offices of employment and vocational training, while in other regions, such as Loreto, they did not become operational. In March 1994 national restructuring and rationalization of the regional labour directorates was undertaken with special emphasis being placed on the creation and/or setting into operation of employment and vocational training offices, which covered until now the regions of Andrés Avelino Cácares, Grau, La Libertad, Chavin and Nor-Oriental del Marañon. In the current month such regions as Inka and José Carlos Mariátegui also would be covered. In the restructured regions it was decided to establish Regional Commissions for Employment Promotion which should include representatives of employers' organizations, professional bodies, the Ministry of Labour and trade unions. So far such commissions had been set up in Grau and La Libertad, but no central trade union organization at the federal level had yet applied for membership; it would appear that they were either not represented or only very slightly represented at the regional level.

With regard to Article 3 of the Convention, he stated that the Government was complying with its requirements at the sectoral level. Given the difficult situation in his country, the problem of unemployment and underemployment had reached an alarming level. The relevant sectors of the central Government were continually meeting with the trade unions to coordinate policies which would suit their interests. The Ministry of Labour and Social Welfare in this connection played the role of coordinator between trade unions and other involved Ministries of the central Government. At the moment such meetings were organized between the Federation of Construction Workers and the Ministries of the Executive, Transport, Communications, Housing and Construction, as well as between the Federation of Bank Employees and the Ministry of Economy and Finance.

The Workers' members referred to the Government's report on the Convention, which was dealt with in the report of the Committee of Experts, and they appreciated the additional written information submitted by the Government representative. They considered that the situation concerning employment and social protection as well as the conditions of work and social dialogue were troubling. In previous years, the Committee of Experts formulated observations concerning this matter on the application of Convention No. 88. The Workers' members also based their considerations on an assessment of employment policy in Peru. It was worrisome that the Government did not recognize the role of social dialogue in this area. They considered tripartism to be a handicap, while the experts had emphasized for many years the value of a social dialogue that was as broad as possible, including consultations with representatives from the informal and rural sectors. It must be borne in mind that 75 per cent of the people were underemployed. The written information submitted by the Government was insufficient, as there was no concrete information concerning the labour market situation and the survey could not be considered a true organized social dialogue. Structural adjustment programmes should not be applied to the detriment only of the poorest people. The costs and social advantages of this process must be equitably distributed. Pursuing these objectives must be a priority not only for the Government but also for other international organizations such as the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank. The employment programmes were insufficient. The objectives of full employment and of social protection were not contradictory. The latter reinforced the social and economic fabric and permitted a stimulation of demand and therefore growth. It consolidated social stability and cohesion of the country. However, the Government only considered it to be a significant obstacle to its employment policy. Whatever the economic problems faced by the country, employment policies must not consider social protection to be a major obstacle. The costs of structural adjustment must be equitably distributed, and a social dialogue must be promoted.

The Employers' members stressed that, in examining the application of this Convention, this Committee must recognize that full employment did not exist in any country. The problems in Peru were serious, as indicated by the report of the Committee of Experts and the information provided by the Government representative. The Government representative admitted that underemployment and unemployment had now attained worrisome proportions and called attention to the Employment Promotion Law of 1990. The experts recognized that this Act had introduced a range of positive measures, in particular the promotion of vocational training, especially for young people. Employment programmes had been established but they could not be implemented due to a lack of funds. Like other countries, Peru had very few statistics. However, such information was important not only to assess the situation but also for the development of policies and programmes. With full awareness of the facts, according to the Government representative, these problems had arisen because until very recently individual provinces had a greater degree of administrative independence but, in the future, it should be easier to obtain good information, although probably not from the rural areas. The Government representative also mentioned the problem of terrorism in his country, which was only getting worse. The Employers' members considered that one could not have an isolated employment policy but rather an overall economic policy which took account of the many interactions in the economy. Employment policy could only be successful if overall economic policy was successful. Consultation with the various social partners was absolutely necessary. This was not just a requirement of the Convention, but it had always been considered a sensible and useful approach. Successful policies required that the Government reached a consensus with all parties concerned. Such consultations with the informal sector amounted to a significant problem. They had difficulty imagining how such consultation could be carried out with such workers. They felt that the Conference Committee should encourage the Government to make every effort to comply with the Convention in full and take all necessary measures to implement sound employment policy.

The Workers' member of Peru referred to the Government's statement that its youth training scheme was intended to provide theoretical and practical training for young people between 18 and 21 years of age. She stressed that, from the point of view of the Peruvian workers, the Employment Promotion Act had only served to increase unemployment and badly paid underemployment. In Peru the age of majority was 18 and the work done by the young people who participated in this programme mainly had permanent jobs pertaining to the principal activities of major companies. This Act made it possible for these companies to fill vacant posts without making contributions to social security, the housing fund and other benefits which the employers called "anti-technical", and left the workers hired under this system with no occupational accident benefits. She insisted that this system did not create employment, but allowed companies to hire workers cheaply to fill permanent posts without offering them any employment stability and leaving them totally unprotected. She added that this Act was passed only in consultation with the employers because tripartism did not function in her country. She concluded by requesting that the conclusions mention that the workers wished to be consulted on matters relating to employment policy in her country.

The Government representative of Germany wished to refer to a specific problem with the observation of the Committee of Experts: "with regard to the measures to make the labour market more flexible, which constitute a large section of the measures set out in the Employment Promotion Act (and which the CGTP criticizes in the above-mentioned communication), the Committee would like to draw the Government's attention to certain provisions of related international labour instruments that provide for the protection of workers against the use of contracts which aim to avoid the protection prescribed by the legislation (see Article 2, paragraph 3, of Convention No. 158 and Paragraph 3 of Recommendation No. 166, concerning termination of employment, 1982) – both of which are referred to in the 1991 presentation of the objectives of the Employment Promotion Act". The speaker said the situation was similar to that discussed by this Committee in connection with Spain under Convention No. 158. In dealing with this case, the Committee of Experts referred to Convention No. 122 when they were interpreting other Conventions. In the passage quoted above, they seemed to interpret Convention No. 122 on the basis of Convention No. 158. The problem was that Peru had not ratified Convention No. 158, which appeared to be an attempt to compel Peru to abide by the obligations of a Convention which it had not ratified. The speaker expressed serious reservations concerning this procedure.

The Government representative stated that he had taken due note of the comments made in different declarations and assured this Committee that the concerns expressed would be communicated to the authorities of his country, which could then provide, as soon as possible, the relevant responses to the ILO.

The Committee took note of the written and oral information provided by the Government representative and of the report of the Committee of Experts. The Committee noted, as did the Committee of Experts, that a certain number of legislative measures have been promulgated which should make it possible to ensure the application of the Convention. The Committee emphasized the crucial importance of consultations with the national organizations of employers and workers in order to counter economic and social problems as well as to formulate and to implement an active employment policy as a major goal in the framework of a coordinated economic and social policy. The Committee expressed the hope that the Government would take all the necessary steps in the near future in order to bring legislation, and above all practice, into conformity with the Convention, and that it would be able to provide complete and detailed information on the progress achieved.

Convention No. 136: Benzene, 1971

Côte d'Ivoire (ratification: 1972). A Government representative indicated that his Government was called to supply information on the inadequacy of the national legislation in respect of benzene in the observations made in respect of his country on the Convention. In this respect he pointed out that a new Labour Code, elaborated with the technical assistance of the Office, was at present with the National Assembly and might be adopted at its next session. The particular feature of this new Code was the reinforcement of the provisions on the safety and health of the workers. The regulations prepared for its implementation were in full conformity with the ILO Conventions. If the Government in its report did not mention the decree referred to since 1984, it was because this decree could not be adopted due to changes which occurred in November 1990 and January 1994 in the Ministry of Employment and Public Service and because of the new law which would necessarily repeal a certain number of regulations. He added, however, that this Committee could be sure that his Government would soon take the measures necessary for the adoption of the implementing texts, in conformity with Articles 1, 2, 4, 6, 8 and 11 of the Convention, in order to ensure the individual and collective protection of workers exposed to benzene.

The Employers' members stated that while those countries who had ratified this technical Convention faced some quite tough requirements, it was necessary because working with benzene could be extremely dangerous and harmful to health. With respect to the Côte d'Ivoire, the experts have been making observations since the ratification of the Convention by that country in 1972 for the simple reason that the law of 1967 was considerably at variance with the requirements of the Convention. These requirements were quite clear and unambiguous and it should therefore be perfectly possible for the Government to include them in the draft legislation. According to the Government representative, this draft legislation, prepared with the assistance of the Office, was now before the Parliament, and the Employers' members hoped that it would in fact be adopted in the course of the next parliamentary session and later on be implemented. They requested the Government to send a copy of this draft legislation to the International Labour Office as soon as possible so that it could be examined once again. They also urged the Government to expedite the parliamentary adoption of this Bill, so that the Committee would finally be able to take note that Côte d'Ivoire was fulfilling its obligations under the Convention.

The Workers' members emphasized the importance of this Convention. For nearly 20 years, the Committee of Experts had noted the non-application of a number of the provisions of the Convention and that, since 1984, the Government had referred to a draft decree to rectify the situation. However, until now nothing had been approved or done to resolve these difficulties. The Workers' members considered that a period of ten years was too long to reply to the comments and to take the necessary measures, taking into account that in other cases concerning other Conventions the Committee of Experts was also obliged to note unfulfilled promises on the part of the Government and the same difficulties, as on Convention No. 52. There was a certain lack of will on the part of the Government to cooperate and to take into account the conclusions and the supervisory bodies. In view of the gravity of the problem and the fact that it presented real dangers for the health and even for the life of workers, the Workers' members believed that the Committee should urge the Government to take the comments of the Committee of Experts seriously, to speed up the adoption of new regulations and to furnish all the information on the measures taken in this field. They hoped that real progress could be registered next year.

The Government representative stated that he had taken due note of the suggestions made by the Employers' and by the Workers' members and assured the Committee that provisions would be taken in line with the recommendations made. He hoped that the texts necessary for the application of the Convention would be adopted in the near future.

The Committee noted the information supplied by the Government representative. It noted with concern, as had the Committee of Experts, that serious discrepancies had existed for many years between certain specific provisions of the Convention and the national legislation and practice, without any real progress having been registered. The Committee expressed the firm hope that the Government would, in the very near future, take all the necessary measures to ensure full application of the Convention, in legislation as well as in practice. The Committee requested the Government to supply, as soon as possible, the draft decree to the Committee of Experts and hoped that it would at last be able to note some real progress in the Government's next report.

Convention No. 158: Termination of Employment, 1982

Spain (ratification: 1985). A Government representative recalled that the Convention had been ratified by Spain in 1985. This Convention had been ratified to date by only 20 countries. This fact led one to consider it as one of those more recent instruments providing for valid but very complex and detailed protection which did not always correspond to existing national schemes providing for the same protection in a different manner, and this might constitute an obstacle to ratification. Studies made in Spain with a view to ratifying this Convention had revealed at the time that Spanish legislation ensured protection of workers in the case of termination of employment that corresponded to and sometimes exceeded that provided for by the Convention. This legislation was criticized by Employers who considered it too rigid and requested a reduction of the procedures required by such a system. There might have been some doubts regarding minor points which could have been dispelled by means of a stricter interpretation of the Convention. The Committee of Experts had not made any significant comments until two Spanish trade unions, basing themselves on a literal reading of the Convention, made comments that disregarded the fact that, on the whole, the protection provided for by Spanish legislation was in conformity with and sometimes even better than that provided by the Convention. As a result of the comments of the trade unions, the Committee made its observation on two points; the first concerning Article 2, paragraph 3 and the second with regard to Article 7 of the Convention.

With regard to Article 2, paragraph 3, the question of the use by enterprises of temporary contracts and their consequences on the stability of employment relations had preoccupied Spanish trade unions as well as the Administration to some extent. This question concerned employment policy and should have been examined in the context of the application of the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122), to verify if the laws in this area adequately address the objective of the fight against unemployment. Respect of this objective was in practice ensured by the control made by the Workers' representatives, the trade unions and by the labour inspectorate. It was in this sense that section 15(4) of the Workers' Charter required employers to notify the legal representatives of workers about fixed-term contracts. The Ministerial Order, No. 2/1991 of 17 January 1991, which was the result of an agreement between the Government and the trade unions, gave workers' representatives the right of access to information with respect to the engagement of workers in order that they had the necessary information to reveal any abuses in recruitment. This Ministerial Order provides for organized consultations with the most representative organizations of employers and workers with a view to creating programmes of action of labour inspection so as to improve recruitment. It was by virtue of this Decree that in 1991 the results of labour inspection activities for 1990 and 1991 and the objectives for 1992 were presented to the social partners. The employers' and workers' organizations had provided their suggestions which were taken account of in the elaboration of the plans for labour inspection for 1992 and 1993. Similarly, the suggestions of the Trade Union Federation of Workers' Commissions (CC.OO) had been integrated into the plans for 1994. Details of the results of inspection activities were at the disposal of this Committee if they were so required. This information should nonetheless be supplemented by describing the guarantees provided to prevent the abuse of the use of temporary contracts. A temporary contract should meet certain objective requirements. It should be in writing and, in the event that it did not meet such requirements, it would legally be considered a contract of unlimited duration. Temporary contracts meant to encourage recruitment and aimed at employment promotion were strictly regulated in Spain. Without going into detail about the rules applicable to them and the statistics on the results achieved which were all provided to the Committee of Experts, it should be stated that Act No. 22/1992 of 30 July 1992 encouraged by means of subsidies the conversion of temporary contracts into contracts of unlimited duration, which addressed the concern of the trade unions about the excessive use of temporary recruitment. To sum up, the legal and information framework provided to control and inspect this question was as developed as possible to prevent abuse of temporary contracts and ensure the objective of Article 2, paragraph 3, of the Convention. All the other related issues raised concerned, in his view, employment policy and Convention No. 122.

The second point of the observation that should be addressed was mainly a legal question. The requirements of Article 7 of the Convention were the only ones that had posed a slight problem at the time of ratification. This Article had three legal requirements. In the first place the termination of the employment contract should relate to the worker's conduct or performance. In this regard the legal services of the Ministry of Labour and in general legal doctrine and jurisprudence considered such termination to be final only after all the claims against this worker were dealt with as a whole. Considering that the trade unions and the Committee of Experts took a literal reading of Article 7, it should be stated that the Spanish text of this Article of the Convention (DNo deberá darse por terminada la relación de trabajo ...") was intended to cover a firm and final termination of employment relations which, in Spanish law, does not result from the simple dispatch of a letter of termination. The second legal requirement of Article 7 consisted of giving workers the right to defend themselves against the allegations before their employment is terminated. Spanish legislation did provide for this but in accordance with procedures destined to have practical impact. This law notably provided for an administrative conciliation procedure before an independent conciliator outside the enterprise. This procedure which was outside other available legal remedies is intended to arrive at an agreement, if possible, including eventually the amount of compensation which would avoid litigation. This was a requirement in all cases to obtain unemployment benefit, and went beyond the requirements of Article 7 by providing protection to the worker even when the employment relationship had not been terminated definitively. These conciliation procedures were not only strict in a legal sense, but were also humane and permitted the verification by the tribunals of the reasons given for termination. The third point dealt with the possibility given to the employer to consider the timeliness and suitability of providing a hearing to the worker. Article 55, paragraph 1, of the Workers' Charter provided for new procedures to be established by collective negotiations. The speaker said he could cite numerous examples of collective agreements that provide for this aspect of the question of termination. The question of termination of employment was very sensitive and traditionally controversial among employers and workers in Spain. In preparing draft laws and during negotiations with the social partners, the labour administration service endeavoured to take account of the demands of both parties.

The Employers' members first noted that the Committee of Experts had stopped referring to Article 11 of the Convention which indicated that the problems relating to it had been resolved. This left the two questions on which the Government representative had provided detailed explanations. The first question referred to whether an excessive use of temporary employment constituted a violation of the Convention. The internal logic of the Convention consisted, on the one hand, of the possibility of excluding from its scope temporary contracts, and on the other hand of requiring safeguards to be provided to prevent recourse being had to such contracts to avoid the protection resulting from this Convention. It was evidently difficult to determine how many such temporary contracts would constitute a violation of the Convention. All it required was that there be no abuse in the use of such contracts in order to avoid the protection provided against the termination of employment. This preoccupation was understandable but difficult to assess and elaborate on. The frequent use of temporary contracts seemed necessary in view of the changes noted in national economies in Europe. The Committee of Experts itself had not provided for specific levels beyond which the use of such contracts would constitute an abuse. In their view the legal context and requirements concerning the use of such contracts as the Government representative had described should be "adequate safeguards" required by the Convention. They wished to express criticism regarding the observation of the Committee of Experts when it referred to Convention No. 122 in order to interpret provisions of Convention No. 158. It was surprising that in order to interpret a technical and legally complicated instrument such as Convention No. 158, that a typically promotional instrument such as Convention No. 122 was used. This presented the risk of creating confusion. It would be inappropriate to prohibit or limit temporary contracts of employment on the basis of the provisions of Convention No. 122, as these types of contracts had a role to play in the context of an employment policy aimed at fighting unemployment. It would therefore be useful for the Committee of Experts to re-examine this question in light of the explanations furnished by the Government representative. The second remark they wished to make concerned Article 7 of the Convention which required that a possibility be given to the worker to make a defence against the allegations made before the termination of employment. The Committee of Experts had indicated that Spanish law permitted recourse to the competent courts against the termination of employment only after a decision had been taken regarding such termination. This was considered by the Committee to be contrary to the Convention. The detailed explanations given by the Government representative appeared to show in reality that the employment relationship was not terminated when the letter of termination was received. The subtle legal analysis that he provided should, as usual, be communicated to the Committee of Experts. To this effect the Government of Spain should submit in writing the oral information it provided to this meeting to enable the Committee of Experts to re-examine the question which could then be seen by this Committee if necessary.

The Workers' members wished to make two remarks regarding the statement made by the Government representative that Convention No. 158 was too detailed and required revision. In the first place it should be stated that Spain had ratified the Convention as it is and it was the duty of this Committee to examine if its legislation and practice were in conformity with the Convention. Secondly, it was not on detail but on the core of the protection provided by the Convention that questions were being raised. The two points raised by the Committee of Experts in its report this year had also been raised in 1992. Since then the Government had undertaken a series of reforms in the areas of recruitment, use of temporary contracts and the right to terminate the employment relationship. In 1992 the Committee of Experts had expressed the hope that the measures taken by the Government would provide better safeguards against the misuse of fixed-term contracts. This was an important question in view of the fact that Spain had a very high number of temporary contracts representing a third of total employment. This could be as a result of many causes, as stated by the Employers' members, but in their view special attention should be paid to the existence of safeguards against the abuse of this type of contract. Despite the explanations and replies provided by the Government in response to the observation of 1992 and despite the statement given by the Government representative that all this information had already been communicated to the Committee of Experts, the experts had once again this year expressed the hope that adequate safeguards would be provided in the near future. With regard to the reference to Convention No. 122 made by the Committee of Experts, they underlined the importance that Committee attached to preventing employment policies from generating precarious contracts that have negative consequences on people and enterprises resulting from the frequent turnover of workers. The Government should rapidly make efforts to decrease to normal levels the number of temporary contracts. The detailed information promised in this respect should be communicated to the Committee of Experts. With regard to Article 7 of the Convention, the Committee of Experts was quite clear in concluding that the legislation was not in conformity with the Convention in that the great majority of workers did not have access to the procedures that would permit them to defend themselves. It was necessary that the Government should take the appropriate measures to give full effect to this Article of the Convention and furnish full details in this respect.

The Workers' member of Spain stated that Convention No. 158 on termination of employment in its Articles 7, 8 and 9 provides for rights and guarantees to workers in case of dismissal. This Convention which is very flexible provides in its Article 2 for various exceptions and possible exclusions to its coverage. The major exception referred to contracts of employment for a specified period of time. However flexible this Convention might be, it did not permit abuse of such temporary contracts avoiding fulfilling the guarantees required by Articles 7, 8 and 9 of the Convention. The law should provide for such abuses and the Spanish Civil Code contained stipulations in this regard. Article 2, paragraph 3, provided for guarantees against abuses of fixed-term contracts. Unemployment in Spain stood at 24 per cent of the population which was double that of the European Community and 35 per cent of the employed held precarious employment. A law that had recently come into force in Spain provided that workers employed in certain circumstances under part-time or fixed-term contracts would not have social security, unemployment and pension benefits. It was therefore reasonable for the Committee of Experts in the second paragraph of its observation to require the Government to continue to inform the ILO of developments in this sphere. The major points related however to Articles 7 and 8. Article 7 provided for an essential right not only for workers but for all citizens. This was the right to be heard before the application of any sanction. This was in his view a fundamental right of any citizen which was provided for in a flexible way in Article 7. Article 8 provided for the right of any citizen to have recourse to labour courts or arbitration tribunals when faced with unjustified termination of the employment relationship. His country implemented Article 8 because the Constitution guaranteed the right of recourse to the courts as fundamental. Article 7 on the contrary was not being applied nor had it ever been guaranteed in the history of Spain. He hoped that it would be applied soon. He recalled that the Committee of Experts clearly distinguished between the right provided for in Articles 7 and 8. He expressed his surprise that a developed European country like Spain would find it difficult to comply with this Convention on a reasonable point that did not affect the national interest, by ensuring to a worker the right to a hearing prior to dismissal by an employer. Compliance with this provision of the Convention was easy and did not require adoption of a text of law. All it required was political will. It was of concern that a Government with the capacity of compliance was not doing so simply because it lacked the political will. He therefore considered that the Government should be urged to take account of this and comply with Article 7 of the Convention.

The Workers' member of Italy stated that, given the importance of the number of temporary contracts in the employment market and because of the unfavourable conditions imposed on workers by such contracts, this constituted an important matter that necessitated safeguarding individual workers' rights. The requirements of Article 7 were essential in establishing a balance between the rights of the parties to the contract.

The Government member of Germany wished to make a general remark before posing two questions concerning Article 2 of the Convention. His general remark concerned the surprising link established by the experts between this Convention and Convention No. 122. Temporary work could, depending on the case, be useful or harmful to employment policy. The question should, therefore, be examined in the context of Convention No. 122 without the need to inject these sort of considerations under Article 2 of Convention No. 158. Temporary contracts that might be criticized for their repercussions on employment could conceivably offer safeguards required by Article 2. The first of the two questions was addressed to the Government representative. It appeared that the parts of the observation of the Committee of Experts relating to Article 2 were based essentially on the comments made by the trade unions and attached to the government report without the Government apparently making use of the possibility to comment on the views of the trade unions. The only indication given by the Government related to preparatory work on a social pact and a wish expressed on this occasion to modify the regulations dealing with fixed-term contracts. The Government representative had, however, presented to this Committee a body of information that should have been submitted to the Committee of Experts. In the absence of the Chairman of the Committee of Experts at this part of the Committee's work, the second question was addressed to the Secretariat. One could read in the same passage of the Committee's observation that the Committee "... would suggest reference in this connection to Paragraph 3 of the Termination of Employment Recommendation, 1982 (No. 166). The Committee asks the Government to keep the ILO informed of the developments in this sphere". He considered it surprising that information was requested on the implementation of a provision of a Recommendation outside article 19 of the Constitution.

The Government representative of Spain stated that the question of temporary contracts related to employment policy and should be dealt with under Convention No. 122. He affirmed that Spain implemented Article 7 of Convention No. 158 as stated in his earlier intervention. He hoped discussion on this subtle legal question would be done away with when all the information provided to the experts had permitted them to make a definitive assessment. With respect to the statement of the Workers' members he wished to state that he never suggested that Convention No. 158 needed to be revised and amended. All he had said was that this Convention was a detailed and technical one with only 20 ratifications to date. He had the impression, perhaps wrongly, that more weight was given to the information provided by the trade unions rather than by governments, as the legislative provisions he referred to, which were proof of implementation of the Convention, had obviously not been taken account. Even though it was true that there were a very large number of fixed-term contracts and very high unemployment in his country, the first priority of his Government was the promotion of employment policy. It was better for people to be employed temporarily rather than unemployed. While it was true that the number of legally authorized temporary contracts had increased with no fraud involved, temporary contracts had been subsidized and converted into contracts of employment for unlimited duration. He further stated that in his country temporary contracts to which the Workers' member of Spain had referred were apprenticeship contracts with some social security protection such as protection against accidents at work. He stressed that Spanish employers were not more demanding than others and if a worker was dismissed for serious reasons it was only after having been given due warning. Furthermore, employers generally respected the various steps that need to be taken before proceedings to terminate an employment relationship. He expressed his surprise, like the Government representative of Germany, at the reference made to Recommendation No. 166. Finally, he reiterated the fact that his Government had furnished all the information requested so that the question could be examined in depth.

The Workers' member of Spain stated that it was completely wrong to assert, as did the Government representative of Spain, that the Committee of Experts followed the directives and opinions of trade unions. In his view the problem was that what had been orally stated by the Government representative and sent in writing many times to the Committee of Experts, according to the Government representative, was not convincing the experts. He asked the Government representatives to cite him the provision of Spanish law that implements Article 7 of the Convention. He urged the Spanish Government to show its good faith once and for all by implementing Article 7 of the Convention. He pointed out that while in practice most Spanish employers respected this requirement of the Convention there were none the less violations as well.

The Workers' member of Uruguay stated that at first sight the Employers' and Governments' questions were bordering on play. Temporary employment was a result of economic policy decisions whether we liked it or not, but resulted in personal, family and social instability which ended up in a social jungle or everyone out for himself. It was not surprising if employers were attempting to manipulate the law but the fact that a government failed to provide a balance was unacceptable. Finally, he expressed the impression he had that the Government was playing the role of employers.

The Committee noted the detailed information and explanation provided by the Government representative as well as the discussion that followed it. It further noted that some discrepancies seemed to continue to exist, both in law and and in practice, in respect of the requirements of two Articles of the Convention. The Committee expressed the hope that the Government would take all the necessary measures to ensure in the near future the full implementation of the Convention both in law and, and of course, in practice. It hoped to note real progress in the next report due from the Government. In this respect it expressed the hope that the detailed information provided by the Government representative would be communicated to the Committee of Experts.

The representative of the Secretary-General wished to indicate that the next General Survey would be devoted to Convention No. 158 and its complementary Recommendation No. 166. This Survey would undoubtedly address the question posed by the Government member of Germany and the Employers' members on the subject of the relations between the two instruments. He added that, with regard to the information coming from governments and organizations of employers and workers, the Committee of Experts had never favoured one or the other as a source and that it was only concerned with the substance of such information.

[1] First year for which this figure is available. [2] As a result of a decision by the Governing Body, detailed reports were requested as from 1958-59 until 1976 only on certain ratified Conventions. [3] As a result of a decision by the Governing Body (November 1976), detailed reports are now requested, according to certain criteria, at yearly, two-yearly or four-yearly intervals.

II. OBSERVATIONS AND INFORMATION CONCERNING THE APPLICATION OF CONVENTIONS IN NON-METROPOLITAN TERRITORIES (ARTICLES 22 AND 35 OF THE CONSTITUTION)

A. General Observations and Information concerning certain Territories

(a) Failure to supply first reports on the application of ratified Conventions

The Workers' members stressed the importance of first reports as a basis of analysis by the Committee of Experts. They also emphasized that reports should be supplied in good time.

The Employers' members also highlighted the crucial importance of the first report and stated that the supply of a first report was not the end of an obligation but the beginning of regular reporting which was the core of the supervisory system.

A Government representative of France stated that the failure was not due to bad faith, referring to the fact that 273 reports were due in 1993 and that six Conventions concerned technical maritime questions and had been extended to the French Southern and Antarctic Territories following their ratification by France. He stated that it was difficult for the Government to prepare reports because a decree concerning registration of ships in these territories was the object of a case raised by a trade union before the DConseil d'Etatä and that, while this case was pending, any answers made by the Government might become invalid.

The Committee noted the information supplied and explanations given by the Government representative of France. It reiterated the crucial importance of submitting first reports on the application of ratified Conventions.

The Committee decided to mention the case of France (French Southern and Antarctic Territories), for Conventions Nos. 53, 69, 74, 92, 133 and 134.

(b) Written information received up to the end of the meeting of the Committee on the Application of Standards[1]

France (Overseas Departments). Since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, the Government has sent the first report due on Convention No. 133.

Netherlands (Aruba). Since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, the Government has sent the reports due on certain Conventions and the replies to most of the Committee's comments.

III. SUBMISSION TO THE COMPETENT AUTHORITIES OF THE CONVENTIONS AND RECOMMENDATIONS ADOPTED BY THE INTERNATIONAL LABOUR CONFERENCE (ARTICLE 19 OF THE CONSTITUTION)

Observations and Information

(a) Failure to submit

The Employers' members recalled that under the terms of the ILO Constitution, instruments adopted at the Conference must be forwarded to the competent authorities of member States within a period of, at most, 18 months. The only countries which were mentioned in paragraph 154 of the General Report were those which had failed to comply with this obligation over the last seven sessions. Bearing that in mind, the Employers' members considered that the number of countries listed in this paragraph was quite excessive. Furthermore, the Employers' members pointed out that many countries thought that what was required here was ratification. They clarified the fact that a country did not have to propose an instrument for ratification within this deadline. All that had to be done was to submit the instrument concerned to the competent authorities in the country so that information could be provided about the existence of the new instrument. A decision to ratify or not could be taken by the Government at a later occasion. However, every government still had an obligation to submit the instrument to the competent authorities. The Employers' members therefore urged governments who had failed to comply with this obligation to remedy the situation as soon as possible. They further urged those governments who were to take the floor to explain the reasons for their failure to submit the instruments to the competent authorities, whether it had been possible for them to remove the obstacles and whether they could comply in the future with their obligations within the set time-frame.

The Workers' members subscribed to the views of the Employers' members and underlined the importance of these cases as well as their excessively high numbers. Indeed, the number of countries that had failed to comply with the obligation to submit was increasing. This increase was very worrying, as was mentioned by the Committee of Experts, to the extent that countries could find it really difficult to catch up with the accumulated backlog. One should insist on the fact that the obligation of submission was fundamental since it constituted the indispensable first step in implementing international labour standards.

A Government representative of Cambodia recalled the political and economic difficulties that his country had experienced during the past 20 years. Since 1975, Cambodia had not been able to participate in the work of the ILO and had not been represented at the International Labour Conference. However, since the Paris Accord of 1991, several changes had occurred amongst which should be mentioned the adoption of a Labour Code as well as the setting up of a Ministry of Labour which nevertheless lacked resources and above all, qualified personnel. Thanks to ILO technical assistance, several reports on ratified and unratified ILO Conventions had been addressed to the Office. The Government would try to implement international labour standards in compliance with its international obligations. To this end, it wished to receive technical assistance from the Office especially in the field of labour inspection and social security.

A Government representative of the Central African Republic recalled that his country had gone through a period of great political instability and recognized that the obligation of submission had not been fulfilled, as mentioned by the Committee of Experts. The Conventions concerned had been submitted in due time to the Government but had never been examined by the Council of Ministers to be then transmitted to Parliament, the authority that was competent to examine and eventually ratify these instruments. Since the return to democracy in 1993, an administrative reform had been undertaken and the Minister of Labour had proceeded to examine all the Conventions and had revised the procedure concerning submission to the competent authorities. Moreover, the Government was at present undertaking a revision of labour legislation and administrative legislation, including the Labour Code of 1961. In this respect the assistance of the ILO had been requested in order to examine the Conventions with a view to new ratifications.

A Government representative of Costa Rica, the Labour Minister, stated that he was the first to regret that the information required had not been communicated. As publication and ratification of international standards was of great importance, he undertook formally to communicate as soon as possible detailed information on the manner in which Costa Rica fulfilled its constitutional obligation to submit the instruments adopted by the International Labour Conference to the competent authorities.

The Workers' member of Costa Rica welcomed the previous intervention but considered that statements made by the Minister to the Conference had no practical impact. He trusted that in the very near future the Government would submit to the legislative assembly of Costa Rica the instruments adopted by the Conference in the hope that certain Conventions would also be ratified.

A Government representative of El Salvador, the Labour Minister, admitted that there had been a delay on the part of the Government in complying with the obligation to submit the instruments adopted by the International Labour Conference to the competent authorities. During the period covering June 1993 to June 1994, the ratification of many important Conventions had been envisaged. In May 1994 a law amending the Labour Code, which included many principles contained in international labour Conventions, had been adopted. It was envisaged that Conventions Nos. 29, 77, 78, 81, 88, 99, 111, 122, 129, 131, 138, 141 and 144 would be ratified very shortly. The nature of the obligation of submission had been clarified after consultation with the ILO. The speaker made a commitment to comply strictly with the obligations resulting from paragraphs 5, 6 and 7 of article 19 of the ILO Constitution in a very short period.

The Workers' member of El Salvador noted the commitment made by the Government representative and hoped the legislative assembly would have the opportunity to examine the Conventions mentioned with a view to their ratification. There was a list of 30 Conventions that a forum of economic and social groupings had submitted for ratification. His country had ratified very few Conventions.

A Government representative of Jamaica indicated that his Government was currently preparing a ministry paper in order to bring to the attention of the competent authority the instruments adopted by the International Labour Conference from its 71st to 78th Sessions. This should be done within one month after which the necessary documents would be forwarded to the Director-General. Although his Government had been having problems over the years, it had had the assistance of the multidisciplinary team attached to the ILO Caribbean Office which had facilitated the matter.

A Government representative of Kenya indicated that the delay in submission to the national competent authorities was due to some unavoidable administrative difficulties, coupled with a general shortage of staff with the requisite knowledge and experience on the subject. His Government had already completed all the necessary technical work in respect of Conventions Nos. 154-169 and it would soon be able to furnish the ILO with the necessary documentation to that effect. His Government fully realized that submission to the national competent authorities of the instruments adopted by various sessions of the International Labour Conference was a fundamental obligation which constituted an indispensable first step in implementing international labour standards.

A Government representative of Madagascar recalled that recent events that had taken place in his country and especially the adoption of a new Constitution setting up the third Republic. Social protection and a policy of full employment had been adopted as part of the Government's social policy. Three draft codes (labour code, the code on social protection and the code on occupation safety and health) were now being elaborated and would be submitted shortly to the National Assembly. The Government attached importance to promoting a tripartite dialogue in order to promote social peace, as shown by the initiatives taken by a certain number of institutions in the fields of employment, social protection and labour inspection. As concerned the obligation of submission, the Government undertook to start this procedure as soon as possible and to transmit to the ILO the reports requested, within the general framework of labour legislation reforms and to the extent that the National Assembly was able to meet.

The Workers' member of Madagascar said that although the political regime had changed, much progress needed to be made. It was to be hoped that the necessary measures would be taken in order to respond to the hopes of the workers, and that the ILO would continue to act to achieve social justice.

A Government representative of Papua New Guinea stated that the instruments that had been adopted from the 77th to 78th Sessions of the International Labour Conference had been submitted to the National Executive Council. Furthermore, they had been submitted to Parliament for formal adoption and endorsement by July 1994.

A Government representative of Paraguay was pleased to inform the Committee of the commitment undertaken by his country to comply with the obligation of submission, and to provide information in this respect to the Committee of Experts. His Government had requested technical assistance from the Office and it was hoped that his country would fulfil the obligation of submission in the near future.

A Government representative of Seychelles indicated that the promulgation of a new Constitution in July 1993 had brought multi-party democracy to her country. The first piece of legislation passed by the new Parliament late last year was the Industrial Relations Act permitting the formation of trade unions. This law came into force in January 1994 and to date six workers' unions had been registered, including one for civil servants. The laws in her country were being reviewed to bring them into line with the new Constitution and international obligations. The Government would provide information on other outstanding matters later this year. She assured the Committee that her Government would endeavour to honour its commitments as a Member of the ILO.

A Government representative of Sierra Leone informed the Committee that between 1972 and 1992, her country had met with many upheavals which had also affected the Department of Labour. However, since 1992 there had been a political will to upgrade and strengthen the Department which had just employed new labour officers. By the year 1995, her Government would take the necessary action to ratify many Conventions which had not yet been examined.

A Government representative of the United Republic of Tanzania indicated that since the last meeting of this Committee, the instruments adopted at the International Labour Conference during the years indicated in the General Report were submitted to the social partners under the auspices of the Labour Advisory Board. Having discussed the instruments, the Board submitted its recommendations to the Government through the Ministry of Labour and Youth Development so as to be forwarded to the Cabinet prior to being tabled before the competent authorities. The administrative procedures prior to the formal submission of the instruments to the competent authorities were almost completed. His Government strongly believed that it could bring itself up to date. The speaker reiterated his Government's commitment to fulfil its responsibilities both at the national and international levels. The department of the Ministry of Labour responsible for international labour standards was being reinforced so that it could cope with these responsibilities with more efficiency. He expressed his Government's appreciation to the ILO for the technical assistance provided in this respect. Finally his Government reassured the Committee that a report on the action taken by the competent authority on this matter would be available for its next session.

A Government representative of Trinidad and Tobago stated that her Government had undertaken to bring to the attention of the competent authorities all the Conventions and Recommendations not yet submitted. The documents had been prepared and forwarded to the Cabinet. The ILO would be informed once Cabinet had laid these documents before the Parliament.

The Workers' members welcomed the participation of a very large number of Government representatives in the discussion of these cases, contrary to last year. Certain governments had in all honesty pointed out past difficulties or those with which they were still confronted. Others had talked of progress made, although they had not yet communicated any report on the matter. It would be appropriate to follow these developments carefully and to verify if these statements were followed by action. It appeared that confusion remained between submission and ratification. In this respect it would be appropriate to emphasize the meaning of this fundamental obligation of submission, which was totally different from ratification.

The Employers' members agreed with the concluding remarks made by the Workers' members. They were pleased to hear the assurances given by the Government representatives concerned that their countries would comply with their obligations. However, it should not be forgotten that these countries had already failed to comply with their obligations for several years. The Employers' members hoped that the Governments would honour their commitments and that reports would be provided on the measures taken.

The Committee noted the information and explanations provided by the Government representatives and by others who had participated in the discussion. It also noted the specific difficulties encountered in complying with this obligation, mentioned by various speakers. Lastly, it took due note of the commitments made by several Government representatives to comply with their constitutional obligation to submit Conventions and Recommendations to the competent authorities in the shortest possible time. The Committee expressed the firm hope that the countries mentioned, namely Antigua and Barbuda, Cambodia, the Central African Republic, Costa Rica, Djibouti, El Salvador, Jamaica, Kenya, Madagascar, Papua New Guinea, Paraguay, Saint Lucia, the Seychelles, Sierra Leone, the Solomon Islands, the United Republic of Tanzania, Trinidad and Tobago and Zaire would, in the near future, send in reports containing information relating to the submission of Conventions and Recommendations to the competent authorities. Delays and failures to submit and the increase in the number of such cases were of great concern to the Committee because these were obligations emanating from the Constitution and were essential to the effectiveness of standard-setting activities. In this connection, the Committee reiterated that the ILO could provide technical assistance to assist compliance with this obligation. The Committee decided to mention all these cases in the appropriate section of its General Report.

International Labour Conference

Eighty-first Session, Geneva, 1994

26

Fifth item on the agenda: Safety and health in mines

Report of the Committee on Safety and Health in Mines

1. The Committee on Safety and Health in Mines was set up by the International Labour Conference at its first sitting on 7 June 1994. It was originally composed of 143 members (65 Government members, 31 Employers' members and 47 Workers' members). To achieve equality of voting strength, each Government member having the right to vote was allotted 1,457 votes, each Employers' member 3,055 votes and each Workers' member 2,015 votes. The composition of the Committee was modified several times during the session and the number of votes attributed to each member was adjusted accordingly.

2. The Committee elected its Officers as follows:

Chairman: Dr. A. Bekes (Government member, Hungary);

Vice-Chairmen: Mr. J. Pirie (Employers' member, Canada) and Mr. J. Maitland (Workers' member, Australia);

Reporter: Mr. S. Thompson (Government member, Australia).

3. At its fifth sitting the Committee appointed a Committee Drafting Committee composed of the following members: Mr. M. Pefanis (Government member of Greece); Mr. D. Lauriski (Employers' member, United States); Mr. P. Benjamin (Workers' member, South Africa); and the Reporter of the Committee.

4. The Committee had before it Reports V(1) and V(2) prepared by the Office for a first discussion by the Conference of the fifth item on the agenda: "Safety and Health in Mines". The Proposed Conclusions submitted by the Office were contained in Report V(2).

5. The Committee held 14 sittings.

Introduction

6. The representative of the Secretary-General, Dr. Chandra Pinnagoda, welcomed the delegates and proceeded with the election of the Chairman. He referred to the considerable risks to life and health associated with mining activities and said that safety and health in mines had been a major concern of the ILO since its foundation. The protection of mineworkers from occupational accidents, injuries and diseases was an issue of worldwide concern and noteworthy efforts had been made by the ILO to improve the conditions in mines. The successful completion of the work of the Committee would lead to the adoption by the Conference of new international labour standards to protect mineworkers.

General discussion

7. The representative of the Secretary-General presented the two reports prepared by the Office and reviewed the considerations which had led the Governing Body to place the item of safety and health in mines on the agenda of the Conference. He said that mines and related infrastructures worldwide comprised a unique and complex industry, ranging from small informal enterprises using traditional manual extraction methods to very large, highly mechanized or labour-intensive operations. Mineworkers were building some of the largest man-made structures in the world, with surface excavations reaching depths of 500 metres, and underground mines reaching depths of 4,000 metres. Mining and civil engineering specialists with highly technical skills and knowledge were engaged on ensuring a working environment which could resist the forces of nature and withstand changes in geological conditions. The occupational risks which mineworkers faced included continuous long-term and acute exposure to such hazardous respirable dusts as those of silica, coal, asbestos, combustible dusts as well as gases and physical factors such as noise, vibration and extreme climatic conditions as well as psychological stresses associated with working alone deep below the surface. There was thus a need for more comprehensive protection of mineworkers. The adoption of new flexible international standards for the mining sector was important for various reasons. Mining was recognized as one of the most hazardous occupations. It was a sector of major economic importance in many member States. There was a need for an instrument specific to mining since existing international labour standards on occupational safety and health and current legislation in a large number of countries were inadequate in addressing the specific needs of this sector in respect of the prevention of occupational accidents and diseases. He further noted that the Proposed Conclusions with a view to a Convention and a Recommendation in Report V(2) were based on replies received to the questionnaire contained in Report V(1). At the time Report V(2) was drawn up, the Office had received 77 replies from member States. Nine other replies were received too late to be incorporated in the Report. Eighty-one of the total of 86 replies supported the development of international instruments on safety and health in mines. Sixty-six of the replies favoured a Convention supplemented by a Recommendation, four favoured a Convention only and ten favoured a Recommendation only. The Chairman thanked the Committee for his unanimous election and hoped that it would accomplish its tasks which would have a significant impact on the improvement of safety and health in mines. He expressed his confidence that there would be a constructive spirit of dialogue and cooperation.

8. The spokesman of the Employers' members said that in developing the instrument on safety and health in mines it was essential to take into account the diversity of the industry and the economic realities with which it was faced. He reaffirmed the employers' primary responsibility for safety and health and stressed the need for cooperation with other parties. The employers would strive towards the development of an instrument which could be accepted by a larger number of countries than had sometimes been the case in the past.

9. The spokesman of the Workers' members commended the decision of the Governing Body to place the item of safety and health in mines on the agenda of the Conference and noted the significance of the participation in the discussion of the Republic of South Africa, a world leader in mining. Particularly important were the issues raised by the Report of the Director-General to the Conference relating to the role and future direction of the Organization. The discussion of the Committee was crucial in setting the course for the development of a progressive instrument in the field of safety and health in mines because, as Report V (1) indicated, surface and underground mines continued to experience heavy loss of life due to safety and health problems in this industry. There was a need for the highest degree of protection of mineworkers in a sector which had been crucial to industrial development. There was also a need to protect the mineworkers' rights and to address such issues as the elimination of child labour and forced labour, and the right to freedom of association, collective bargaining and safety and health at the workplace. He added that in a world beset by economic problems, ethnic tensions, doubt and uncertainty, a strong instrument would protect not only mineworkers faced with specific hazards but all workers in all parts of the industry.

10. The Government member of Japan noted the significance of an international instrument on safety and health in mines in view of the need for ensuring the safety and health of mineworkers. The instrument should be sufficiently flexible to ensure wide acceptability by member States.

11. The Workers' member from the Republic of South Africa reiterated the need for developing an instrument on safety and health in mines in view of the heavy toll of accidents, diseases and fatalities among mineworkers. For example, in the Republic of South Africa, the mining industry accounted for 10 per cent of the GDP and 50 per cent of export earnings. Mineworkers made up as much as five per cent of the economically active population. Of these, many were disabled and paid compensation. Given the role played by tripartite dialogue, freedom to organize was essential in the mining industry. He supported the development of a Convention and a Recommendation on safety and health in mines with account being taken of other ILO instruments.

12. The Government member of Greece, speaking on behalf of the Government members of Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, Greece, Ireland, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain and the United Kingdom, member States of the European Communities (EC), stated that safety and health in mines was a very important subject for the EC. She supported the discussion on safety and health in mines and pledged to share the EC experience with the Committee.

13. The Government member of China said that it was difficult to foresee events in the mining industry which continued to be a hazardous one. Given the contribution of the industry to the economic development, attention should be given to the issue of safety and health in mines, and the relevant standards should be improved.

14. The Government member of Turkey pointed out that the number of workers engaged in mining was high and that in countries like Turkey eighty per cent of them worked in coal mines. Most came from rural areas and had little education. Mines were characterized by poor working conditions, such as inadequate ventilation, and the development of a new instrument was timely.

15. The Workers' member of France said that the mining industry was noted for its high rate of risk, including fatalities attributed to pneumoconiosis and in particular, silicosis. Consistent statistics on injuries and fatalities in mining were lacking. However, the incidence of occupational diseases could be lowered significantly if proper action was taken. In the most advanced countries, such accidents and diseases had been significantly reduced through mechanization, automation and proper training. Support should be given to a binding instrument which should define minimum standards which could be easily applied in all countries regardless of the level of technological development and investment. The issue of subcontracting should also be addressed with due attention given to training and the supervision of workers.

16. The Workers' member of Algeria said that despite existing legislation, mineworkers continued to suffer from a number of occupational accidents and diseases. There was a need for action on safety and health in mines and the proposed Convention under discussion would be a valuable instrument. It should be flexible enough to ensure wide application. He also emphasized the contribution of non-governmental organizations to the protection of mineworkers.

17. The Government member of Canada considered that the new instrument should take the form of a new Convention which should be clearly structured to facilitate its acceptance by member States.

18. The Government member of India noted that safety and health problems in the mining industry were unique and that tripartite cooperation was essential to resolving such problems. He expressed his support for a new instrument which could bridge existing gaps in some national legislations.

19. The Government member of the United States emphasized that the mining industry was crucial to the development of the economy and provided a large number of highly paid job opportunities. But thousands of mineworkers were injured or killed on the job every year throughout the world. These figures could be dramatically reduced through the effective use and enforcement of safety and health standards. However, these standards differed from one country to another. Given the age of the ILO instruments relating to safety and health in mines, a comprehensive Convention on the subject was indispensable.

20. The Workers' member of the United States pointed out that a large number of accidents, injuries and deaths occurred in mines each year and that these could be prevented. Occupational hazards in mines had the same effects on mineworkers in different countries and the development and enforcement of legislation in this field could protect their lives. The proposed Convention could extend protection to all mineworkers and the support of the employers was needed in achieving this protection.

21. The Government member of Sweden concurred that a number of hazards existed in the mining industry. The measures taken to protect mineworkers varied from country to country. Whilst in some countries, such as Sweden, mines were provided with two exits, the risk persisted especially when deadly smoke from a mine fire filled the underground working too quickly to allow mine workers reach a place of safety. The use of a safety chamber equipped with breathing apparatus, water, food and telephone connection provided a safer alternative in the event of mining accidents. Since solutions differed from one country to another, the proposed instrument should be sufficiently general to ensure wider application.

Examination of the Proposed Conclusions contained in Report V(2)

Form of the international instruments

Point 1 and Point 2

22. Two amendments by the Employers' members to insert the word "an" after the word "adopt" in Point 1, to replace the words "These standards" by the words "This standard" and to delete the words "Convention supplemented by a", in Point 2, on the grounds that the change sought flexibility through the development of an instrument in the form of a Recommendation only, and that existing international labour Conventions on safety and health adequately addressed mining. In this regard, the Employers' spokesman cautioned against the development of excessive detail in a Convention, which might discourage ratification to the detriment of the protection of the majority of mineworkers. In the face of opposition by the majority, the amendments were withdrawn.

23. Point 1 and Point 2 were adopted without amendment.

Preamble

Point 3

24. An amendment by the Workers' members to refer to four additional instruments in the preamble was accepted. The Workers' members submitted another amendment to add a text referring to the workers' need and to right to information, genuine consultation and training; the prevention or reduction of the safety and health hazards in mining; the protection of the environment; to Chapter 29 of Agenda 21 of the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development (UNCED); and the need to cooperate with other UN organizations and to note their instruments which were relevant to the subject. Some Government members asked for clarification concerning the subject-matter of Chapter 29 of Agenda 21 and the Employers' members opposed reference to it. The Workers' members replied by subamending their amendment to delete the reference to UNCED. The amendment as subamended was accepted.

25. Point 3, as amended, was adopted.

Scope, definitions and means of application

Point 4

26. The Workers' members proposed to delete clause (b) in order to give a wider scope to the instruments. This was opposed by the Employers' and several Government members on the grounds that exemption of certain categories of mines provided flexibility in the application of the instruments, and the amendment was subsequently withdrawn.

27. The two amendments submitted by the Government members of Malawi, Republic of South Africa and Zimbabwe and by the Employers' members to insert the words "mines or" after the word "certain" in sub-clause (b)(i) were subamended by the Workers' members who proposed to refer to mandatory consultation with the most representative organizations of employers and workers in clause (b) and to the temporary exclusion of certain categories of mines where special problems of a substantive nature arose so long as the health and safety level merited such temporary exclusion in sub-clause (b)(i). The subamendment was opposed by the Employers' and several Government members who argued that it introduced a number of criteria which were restrictive in nature, and was subsequently withdrawn. Following opposition to the two amendments on the grounds that they would lead to inconsistency of enforcement at the national level and that exclusion should refer to categories of mines and not to certain individual mines, they were withdrawn.

28. An amendment was submitted by the Government members of Australia, Canada, New Zealand and Turkey to replace sub-clause (b)(ii) by a new clause (c) referring to the compliance by member States with Article 22 of the Constitution of the ILO, in order to allow for scrutiny before mines were excluded from the scope of the instrument. The amendment was subamended by the Workers' members who proposed to retain sub-clause (b)(ii) by ending it with the words: "within a fixed period of time" and to add a new clause to read: "and progress towards wider application". Following opposition to the subamendment for the reason that the reference to a fixed period of time compromised flexibility of the instrument, the Workers' members withdrew their subamendment and proposed a new subamendment, on a suggestion by the Government members of member States of the EC, to retain the original sub-clause (b)(ii) and add the new clause in the words of the amendment referred to above. This was adopted and an amendment by the Employers' members to insert the words "mines or" after the word "certain" in sub-clause (b)(ii) was not discussed.

29. Point 4, as amended, was adopted.

30. An amendment was proposed by the Employers' members to replace the definition of the word "mine" by the words: "those activities so defined as a mine by the competent authority of each member State, after consulting the most representative organizations of employers and workers concerned". It was opposed by the Workers' members on the grounds that the object of the scope of the proposed instrument was to give guidance to member States through a common approach. It was also opposed by several Government members including those of the member States of the EC and the United States, India, Canada, Australia, Nigeria and Austria who stated that it was important to have a clear definition of the term "mine", without which the value of the Convention would diminish. Faced by this opposition, the amendment was withdrawn.

31. The Government members of Canada and Turkey proposed to replace the words "prospecting for" in sub-clause (a)(i) by the words "exploration for minerals involving mechanical disturbance of the ground" so as to exclude from the scope of the instruments a wide range of activities carried out by such persons as tourists, geologists and others engaged in informal activities unrelated to mining. This was subamended by the Government member of India who proposed to precede the amendment by the words "excavation for the purpose of". In the face of opposition by the Employers' and Workers' members as well as by other Government members the subamendment was withdrawn and followed by another subamendment by the Workers' members who proposed to insert the words "and other substances" after the word "minerals". This subamendment was opposed since the term "minerals", as in the case in some national legislations, such as that of Canada, Australia, Austria and the United States, included the substances which the subamendment sought to cover, in particular sand, gravel and clay. The subamendment was subsequently withdrawn in favour of the amendment which was accepted. As a result of this discussion, the Workers' members withdrew their amendment which sought to insert the same words "and other substances" after the word "minerals" in sub-clause (a)(i), which they previously proposed as an amendment and withdrew.

32. Three similar amendments were submitted by the Government members of the Czech Republic and Slovakia, by the Government members of Canada and India, and by the Government member of China to delete the words "other than extraction through the drilling of boreholes" on the grounds that the drilling of boreholes could be used in the mining of minerals and that the proposed instrument had provisions for exclusions under clause 4(b). Whilst the Government members of the member States of the EC opposed the amendments on the grounds that borehole drilling used different technologies which were subject to separate regulations, the majority supported the amendments and they were accepted. Based on this outcome, the two amendments by the Government members of the member States of the EC seeking to insert the words "prospecting for or" after the word "than" and by the Workers' members to replace the words "other than" by the word "and" in sub-clause (a)(i) were not discussed.

33. An amendment by the Workers' members to insert the words: "carbonization, weighing, testing, loading, disposing, pelletizing, briquetting, smelting and transportation" after the word "washing" in sub-clause (a)(ii) in order to ensure broader coverage was discussed and withdrawn after it was argued that the list was too detailed, could not be exhausted, and referred to activities which did not necessarily take place at mining sites and that some of the terms mentioned had already been covered by other international labour Conventions. The Workers' members also submitted and withdrew an amendment to end sub-clause (a)(ii) with the words, "and other substances" based on the explanation given previously regarding the coverage of the term "minerals". A further amendment by the Workers' members to add a new sub-clause under clause (a) to read "shaft and slope sinking" was withdrawn following opposition by the Employers' and some Government members who explained that the additional terms were already encompassed by the reference to extraction. Consequently, the subamendment proposed by the Government member of Slovenia to replace the subamendment by the words: "all underground mining construction activities" was not discussed.

34. The Workers' members proposed to insert the word "appliances" after the word "buildings" in clause (b) in order to ensure the coverage of instruments such as electrical appliances. This was subamended by the Employers' members who proposed to end the amendment by the words: "at surface or underground mine sites". This was supported by the majority, and the amendment as subamended was accepted.

35. Point 5, as amended, was adopted.

36. An amendment by the Employers' members to replace the word "ensuring" by the word "effecting" in paragraph (1) on the grounds that the former implied absoluteness which was difficult to guarantee, was opposed by the majority since "ensuring" was the term commonly used in ILO instruments, and withdrawn. Another amendment by the Government members of Malawi, Republic of South Africa, Zambia and Zimbabwe to delete the word "should" from the second line of paragraph (1) was withdrawn following opposition by the majority who favoured consistency with the language used in other ILO instruments.

37. An amendment was proposed by the Government members of Australia, Canada, India, Norway, Slovenia, Sweden and Turkey to insert the following words at the end of paragraph (1): "or other means in accordance with national practice" in order to offer flexibility in the application of the proposed Convention. The Employers' members sought clarification as to what the words "other means" referred and the Workers' members opposed the amendment on the grounds that it devalued the draft instrument. They proposed a subamendment to end the text of the amendment by the words: "which have legal force". After a lengthy discussion during which the introduction of the words "legal force" raised questions regarding the status of the word "standards" in paragraphs (1) and (2), clarification was given by the Legal Adviser of the Conference as follows:

> Point 6 appears in the section of the Proposed Conclusions entitled Scope, Definitions and Means of Application. It is followed by separate sections entitled Proposed Conclusions with a view to a Convention and Proposed Conclusions with a view to a Recommendation. The Scope, Definitions and Means of Application have been worded by the Office in a way that left open to the Committee the decision in Point 2, to have both a proposed Convention and a proposed Recommendation. It was for this reason that the text of Point 6 read "standards". However, only provisions that are appropriate to both a proposed Convention and a proposed Recommendation would appear in each of them. Paragraph 6(1) refers to measures for ensuring application to be prescribed by national laws and regulations. A requirement of this type is appropriate only as part of a Convention, which would create binding obligations if ratified. Presuming the Committee will examine the question next year, it would therefore not appear in the text of a proposed Recommendation, but only in the text of a proposed Convention. It is possible that this approach could be taken to Paragraph 6(2) as well.

Based on the clarification provided by the Legal Adviser of the Conference and accepted by the Committee, the Workers' members withdrew their subamendment. The amendment was subsequently withdrawn. As a result of this discussion, a similar amendment to paragraph (2) of Point 6 submitted by the Government members of Australia, Canada, India, Norway, Slovenia, Sweden and Turkey to insert the words "or other means of application" after the word "regulations" was withdrawn.

38. The first part of an amendment by the Employers' members to replace the word "should" by the word "may" in paragraph 2 in order to use clearer and less binding language was supported by some Government members but opposed by the Workers' members who preferred to maintain consistency with the text of other instruments. It was also opposed by some Government members who argued that in view of the need to supplement the laws and regulations with codes and standards, the word "may" would render the passage of those instruments optional, which was not the intention of the provision. Following a lengthy discussion, the first part of the amendment was rejected by 34,272 votes against 32,592 in favour with no abstentions. The second part of the amendment sought to add the words: ", as recognized by the competent authority" at the end of paragraph 2 in order to attach clearly the responsibility of elaborating and supplementing the laws and regulations to the competent authority. The Workers' members supported this part of the amendment but subamended it to replace the word "recognized" by the word "determined". Given the support of the Employers' members, the second part of the amendment, as subamended, was accepted. The amendment, as subamended, was accepted.

39. An amendment by the Workers' members to insert the word ", guidelines" after the word "standards" in paragraph 2 was supported and accepted. Another amendment by the Workers' members to delete the words, "where appropriate" from paragraph 2 was opposed by the majority on the grounds that the words were needed for the purposes of flexibility, and subsequently withdrawn.

40. Point 6, as amended, was adopted.

41. The Workers' members proposed to replace the text by two paragraphs which read:

(1) In the light of national conditions and practice and with agreement of the most representative organization of employers, workers and other concerned parties, each member State should formulate, carry out and periodically review a coherent policy on safety and health in mines, particularly with regard to the measures to give effect to the provisions of the standards.

(2) This policy should be implemented through preventive and protective measures and shall promote the establishment of a safety and health culture and the use of best available technologies.

The spokesman of the Workers' members highlighted the importance attached to the commitment, in the proposed paragraph (1), as a significant general principle for the workers, that each member State formulate and periodically review safety and health policies in mining and that paragraph (1) was not a departure from what has been provided by the Prevention of Major Industrial Accidents Convention, 1993 (No. 174). In the ensuing discussion of the first part of the amendment which was supported by some Government members, the Employers' members expressed their opposition by stating their preference for the text provided by the Office. Their view was also reiterated by the Government members of the member States of the EC who felt that despite the importance of this commitment it could give rise to complications for the ratification of a future Convention and the application of its provisions. Opposition was also voiced by other Government members who felt that the paragraph broadened the scope of the proposed instrument and imposed constraints on governments. Following a lengthy discussion the Workers' members proposed a subamendment to replace in paragraph (1) of their amendment the words: "with agreement of" by the words: "after consultation with", to insert the word "and" before the word "workers" and to delete the words: "and other concerned parties" in an attempt to meet the concerns expressed by the Government members of the member States of the EC and other Government members. This was subamended by the Employers' members who proposed the addition of the word "concerned" after the word "workers". Following support by the Workers' members, the subamendment, as subamended, was accepted, and paragraph (1) of the amendment, as subamended, was accepted. In introducing the second part of the amendment the Workers' members noted the importance of the commitment to the development of a safety and health culture and the need for use of the best available technologies. Whilst the Employers' members appreciated the value of inculcating a safety and health culture, they pointed out that it could not be achieved through legislation as it was a concept which was developed over time through consultation, cooperation and voluntary action. They added that the reference to the best available technologies would impede the ratification of the Convention, an observation which was supported by some Government members. Following a request made by the Workers' members, the representative of the Secretary-General noted that "safety culture" had so far not been introduced into ILO instruments but was used in the Basic Safety Standards of the International Atomic Energy Agency. The Government member of Canada expressed his sympathy with the idea of a safety culture but stated that part two of the amendment was a duplication of the first part and that the reference to best available technologies was already encompassed by earlier provisions. Similar views were reiterated by other Government members including those of India, Malawi, Nigeria, South Africa and the United States. At this juncture, the Workers' members asked the Office to place on record that the Committee had recognized the potential of safety culture as a commitment for promoting safety and health and withdrew the second part of their amendment.

42. Point 7, as amended, was adopted.

Proposed Conclusions with a view to a Convention

I. General provisions

Point 8

43. An amendment submitted by the Government members of Australia, Canada, Finland, India, New Zealand, Poland, Slovenia and Sweden to replace the introductory line by the text: "Pursuant to Point 6, each member State should, through national laws or regulations or other means in accordance with national practice:", was withdrawn since it was submitted on the assumption that this text would have been adopted in Point 6.

44. Amendments were submitted by the Government members of the member States of the EC to replace the words "responsible for" by the words "for the supervision of"; by the Employers' members to replace the words "responsible for" by the words "to monitor and regulate"; and by the Government member of the United States, seconded by the Government member of India, to replace the word "responsible" by the words "with oversight responsibility", in clause (a). The Workers' members, while expressing their sympathy with the three amendments, proposed to subamend the first amendment by inserting the words: "and regulation" after the word: "supervision". This was supported by some Government members and opposed by the Employers' members who believed that the word "supervision" exceeded the responsibility of the competent authority, and by other Government members for similar reasons. During the discussion, the Government member of the United States withdrew his amendment in favour of that submitted by the Employers' members. After a lengthy discussion the Workers' members expressed concern regarding the apparent discrepancy between the English and French versions of the Office text and withdrew their original amendment in favour of a new subamendment in which they proposed to use the words: "monitor and regulate" in the English version and the words "superviser et réglementer" in the French version. This was accepted by the Employers' members who withdrew their amendment and requested their concern as to linguistic discrepancy to be referred to the Drafting Committee. The amendment, as subamended, was accepted.

45. An amendment by the Workers' members sought to insert the words "after consultation with the most representative organizations of workers and employers", in clause (a) in order to ensure maximum consultation on all safety and health issues. This was opposed by the Employers' members who noted that the process of consultation had already been ensured in Point 7, and by other Government members for similar reasons. The amendment was subsequently withdrawn.

46. In the light of previous discussion, the Government member of the United States withdrew an amendment to replace the words: "the supervision of" by "the employer to supervise" in sub-clause (b)(i). An amendment by the Workers' members to insert the word "regular" after the word "the" in sub-clause (b)(ii) to provide for continuous monitoring of mines, was withdrawn after opposition by the Employers' members and several Government members that the proposal went beyond what was required, locked the inspection to a schedule which was the responsibility of the competent authority to establish, and that the word "regular" did not determine the periodicity of inspection. Asking that the expression of support by some Government members to their amendment be noted, the Workers' members withdrew it. The Workers' members proposed another amendment to insert the words: "and auditing" after the word "inspection" in sub-clause (b)(ii) which would enhance the text by introducing a concept which was gaining momentum in the industry. They explained that the term referred to the examination of safety and health arrangements at the mine, a procedure which was the responsibility of the competent authorities. This was opposed by the Employers' members because the intent of the amendment had already been covered by the provisions of Point 7. The Government members of the member States of the EC also noted that the intent of the amendment was covered in Point 16. Following opposition from other Government members, the Workers' members withdrew their amendment despite their belief that "auditing" went beyond "inspection".

47. An amendment by the Workers' members to insert the words "procedures for" before the word "reporting" in sub-clause (b)(iii) was accepted. An amendment by the Employers' members to end sub-clause (b)(iii) with the words "as defined by each member State's own regulations" in order to attribute clearly the regulations to the member State was subamended by the Workers' members to insert the words "legislation or" after the word "own" and accepted and adopted. Based on this outcome, the amendment by the Government members of Australia, Canada and the United States to end sub-clause (b)(iii) by the words ", as defined by implementing regulations" was not discussed.

48. An amendment by the Workers' members to insert the words "occupational diseases" before the word "accidents" in sub-clause (b)(iv) was accepted. The Government members of Australia, Canada and the United States proposed an amendment to end sub-clause (b)(iv) by the words ", as defined by implementing regulations" to ensure that the definition of the terms "dangerous occurrences" was best left to the individual member State. While agreeing with the thrust of the amendment, the Workers' members subamended it by the insertion of the words "legislation or" before the word "regulation". This was further subamended by the Employers' members, who preferred to use similar text to that used previously by proposing to replace the word "implementing" by the words "each member State's own legislation or", which was accepted.

49. Three amendments were submitted for the addition of new sub-clauses under clause (b). The first was proposed by the Workers' members to add a new sub-clause as follows: "that the competent authority should have the power, on safety and health grounds, to suspend permanently, temporarily or restrict mining activities". It was subamended by the Employers' members as follows: "the competent authority to have the power, on imminently dangerous safety or health grounds, to suspend or restrict mining activities until such time as the condition(s) causing the suspension or restriction is corrected". This was opposed by the Workers' members who argued that the use of the word "imminently" would restrict the power of the competent authority. After opposition by several Government members for similar reasons, the Employers' members subamended their subamendment by deleting the reference to the words "imminently dangerous". The subamendment was accepted, and the amendment, as subamended, was accepted.

50. The second amendment was also submitted by the Workers' members who proposed a new sub-clause under clause (b) as follows: "the establishment of effective procedures to ensure the monitoring and implementation of the rights of workers and their representatives to participate and be consulted". This was opposed by the Employers' members and some Government members on the grounds that the provision did not address the safety and health issue and that the principle of consultation was covered under Point 7 of the proposed instrument. Some Government members, however, noted that some national legislation, as in the United States, Canada and Tunisia referred to a similar consultative mechanism and supported the amendment. The Workers' members pointed out that the principle of consultation was included under the general provisions of the Proposed Conclusions with a view to a Convention and was as such different from that to which reference was made under the section dealing with Scope Definitions and Means of Application of the proposed instrument. The Employers' members maintained their opposition to a reintroduction of the reference of the principle, emphasizing however that they were very much in favour of the workers' right for consultation as such. Following further opposition by the Government member of Australia who expressed reservations about the words "monitoring" and "rights" in the plural form, the Workers' members introduced a subamendment to delete the words "monitoring and", replace the word "rights" by the word "right" and to add the words "on health and safety at the workplace" after the word "consulted". Following majority support of this subamendment by the Government members of the member States of the EC and several Government members, the Employers' members introduced a subamendment which proposed the insertion of the words "and duty" after the word "right", and the word "comply" before the word "participate". This was opposed by the Workers' members since the new text referred to a provision which had already been addressed under previous points. This view was shared by several Government members following which the Employers' members withdrew their subamendment, and the amendment, as subamended by the Workers' members was accepted.

51. The third amendment by the Workers' members proposed to add a new sub-clause under clause (b) as follows: "training, mine examination, certification and provision of health surveillance". This was opposed by the Employers' members and several other Government members for the reasons that the term "examination" was covered by the term "inspection" addressed by sub-clause (b)(ii), the subject of health surveillance was covered under Point 14 and training was covered under Point 12. The Workers' members introduced a subamendment to delete the words "mine examination", and explained that the word "certification" meant the process of recognizing persons to carry out designated tasks. Faced with continued opposition, the amendment was withdrawn.

52. Eight amendments were introduced to clause (c). The amendment by the Government members of member States of the EC sought to replace the text: "submit for ... operation;" by the following text: "prepare appropriate plans of workings before the start of operation. The plans must be brought up to date periodically and held available at the workplace." The working plans referred to the plans of workings themselves as well as ventilation plans, fire and rescue plans, electricity plans, inrush protection plans and any similar statutory plans that had to be prepared for safety and health reasons. This was supported by the Employers' members and by other Government members. The Workers' members introduced a subamendment to add the word "both" after the word "workings", the words "and in the event of any significant modification" after the word "operation", and the words "and submit for authorization" after the word "prepare". This was opposed by the Employers' members who argued that reintroducing the concept of authorization changed the meaning and that the reference to significant modification was unnecessary since it was encompassed by the word "periodically". The Government members of member States of the EC and the Government member of Australia also opposed it as prior authorization was impractical. The subamendment was further subamended by the Workers' members to delete the words, "and submit for authorization", which was also subamended by the Government member of Australia to replace the word "workplace" by the word "minesite". The subamendments were supported by the Employers' members, who asked that the text on the plans of workings be referred to the Drafting Committee to ensure consistency between the English and French versions, by the Workers' members and by other Government members and was accepted. The amendment, as subamended, was accepted on the understanding that it would be referred to the Drafting Committee for revision of the French version. Based on the outcome of the discussion of this amendment, the seven other amendments originally submitted on the same clause were not discussed.

53. An amendment by the Workers' members to insert the words "and hazardous chemicals" after the word "devices" and to replace the word "and" after the word "explosives" by a comma was opposed by the Employers' members on the grounds that the reference to hazardous chemicals changed the whole concept of the clause and that hazardous chemicals were adequately covered by the Chemicals Convention, 1990 (No. 170). Similar opposition was voiced by other Government members. Recognizing that the Chemicals Convention, 1990 (No. 170) adequately covered hazardous chemicals, the Workers' members withdrew their amendment.

54. An amendment by the Employers' members to insert the words "or under the direct supervision of" after the word "by" and to delete the word "only" in clause (d) to ensure coverage of a variety of situations which might arise was supported by the Workers' members and adopted. An amendment by the Workers' members to end sub-clause (e)(i) by the words "and appropriate medical facilities" was supported by the Employers' members following an explanation by the Workers' spokesman that reference could mean a first-aid station and not necessarily a state of the art clinic, and was accepted.

55. Two amendments, in two parts each, were introduced to sub-clause (e)(ii). One amendment by the Workers' members sought to insert the words "which are of a self-contained type, last for a sufficient length of time, are immediately accessible, safe and of sufficient capacity to reach the nearest safe area" after the word "devices" as part one and to delete the words "where necessary" as part two of the amendment. In discussing the first part of the amendment, when the Workers' spokesman explained that the term "self contained" referred to a self sufficient breathing apparatus which provided oxygen, the Employers' members expressed opposition on the grounds that the text provided too many details which would be more appropriate to a Recommendation. Following further opposition from the Government member of Australia who explained that the amendment broadened the scope of the instrument and from the Government member of Botswana who expressed reservation regarding the practicality of reaching the nearest safe area, this part of the amendment was withdrawn. The first part of the second amendment submitted by the Government members of Australia, Canada, Finland, Norway and Sweden sought to end sub-clause (ii) with the words "in coal mines and, where necessary, for underground workers in metalliferous mines" and the second part proposed the deletion of the words ", where necessary". In introducing the first part of the amendment the Government member of Australia explained that the requirement for providing self-rescue canister-type breathing apparatus to mineworkers was not so stringent in metalliferous mines with proper ventilation, and that such apparatus was required only when a hazard existed. This was supported by the Employers' members who concurred and also added that self-rescue breathing apparatus required in underground mines was not needed in surface mines. Following opposition by the Workers' members to the first part of the amendment who believed that there were mines other than coal mines which required the use of self-rescue respiratory devices, the Government member of the Czech Republic proposed an amendment to replace the word "metalliferous" by the word "non-coal". This was accepted by the Employers' members but not by the Workers' members who further subamended the subamendment by proposing the deletion of the words "where necessary" in the first line of the text. This was accepted and the amendment, as subamended, was accepted. As a result of the discussion, the second parts of the two amendments introduced to sub-clause (e)(ii) were not discussed.

56. The Workers' members introduced three amendments for new sub-clauses under clause (e). The first amendment read: "requirements for the safe storage, transportation and disposal of waste", and was intended to ensure the establishment of a more complete set of provisions and national laws and regulations. They explained that the term "waste" related to the activities already included under the definition of the word "mine" in Point 5. Following support by the Employers' members, the amendment was adopted. The second amendment read as follows: "that the provisions mentioned in this Point should be regularly assessed, reviewed and updated". This amendment, which sought to provide for the regular assessment and introduction of new technology, was opposed by several Government members and by the Employers' members on the grounds that its intent was covered under Point 7. Pointing out that the purpose of the proposal was to delineate the responsibility of the competent authority, and accepting that its intent was covered under Point 7, the Workers' members withdrew the amendment. The third amendment by the Workers' members to add a new sub-clause under clause (e) to read as follows: "that mine inspectors, independent of the mine employer, have the powers to ensure the rectification of dangerous occurrences or practices", was aimed at further defining the role of the personnel of the competent authority. It was opposed by the Employers' members and other Government members as redundant since inspection had already been included under a previous clause. Noting that the concept of independence had not been covered before, the Government member of the United States proposed a subamendment to read: "that mine inspectors be independent of the mine employer". This was further amended by the Government member of Turkey who proposed the addition of the words "and workers" at the end of the subamendment and place the word "employer" in the plural. The Employers' members maintained their opposition by explaining that independence could compromise the consultative mechanism, at which stage the Workers' members noted the Employers' observation and withdrew the amendment.

57. The Government members of Australia, Canada and Turkey introduced the following amendment as a new clause: "provide powers for mines inspectors, independent of the mine employer, to ensure the rectification of dangerous occurrences or practices", in order to address the issue of rectification of dangerous occurrences or practices which had not been covered by the new subclause under Point 8(b). Following support by the Workers' members, and opposition by the Employers' members, the Government member of Japan introduced a subamendment to add the words "and workers" after the word "employer". While this was supported by the Workers' members and some Government members, it was opposed by the Government members of member States of the EC on the grounds that rectification of dangerous occurrences was not the responsibility of the mine inspector. The Government member of Nigeria subamended the text further by proposing the deletion of the words ", independent of the mine employer" and the addition of the words "by the mine employer" at the end of the text. Following withdrawal of the amendment by the Government member of Canada, the subamendment was not discussed.

58. Point 8, as amended, was adopted.

II. Preventive and protective measures at the mine

New Point (before Point 9)

59. The Government members of Canada, Finland, Norway, Sweden and the United States introduced a new Point defining the term "employer" as: "In the context of this Convention and Recommendation the word employer means any physical or legal person who employs one or more workers in a mine and as the context requires, contractors", as similar definitions appeared in other ILO instruments. This was subamended by the Workers' members by the addition of the words "or who contracts for the services of" after the word "employs" in order to extend coverage of the definition to labour agencies which contracted the services of individuals for the employer. This was accepted by the Government members and supported by the Employers' members who suggested that the definition belonged under the heading of "Scope, Definitions and Means of Application" of the proposed instrument and that its proper placing be left to the Drafting Committee. Several Government members expressed reservations about the inclusion of the definition in the proposed instrument on the grounds that governments should be left with flexibility in defining the term as was the case in a number of national legislations. The proposal, as amended, was accepted.

60. The new Point, as amended, was adopted.

61. An amendment by the Workers' members in four parts, and another by the Employers' members in three parts, were introduced to this Point. The first part of the Workers' members' amendment sought to add the words "National laws and regulations pursuant to point 6 should provide that" before the word "Employers". It was opposed by the Employers' members as superfluous since its concern would automatically be met upon ratification of the Convention. Following further opposition by several Government members on the grounds that Point 6(1) covered the intention of this part of the amendment, it was withdrawn. The second part of the amendment sought to insert the words "identify all hazards within the undertaking and" after the word "should" to clarify the employers' responsibilities. This was opposed by the Employers' members who explained that the proposal provided unnecessary details and that there were more measures to be undertaken by the employers than the task of identification. Following opposition by other Government members, a subamendment was introduced by the Government member of Gabon to add the words "in cooperation with the workers" after the words "undertaking and". This subamendment was not discussed since the Workers' members withdrew this part of the amendment and stated their satisfaction with the Committee's observation that their concern was covered elsewhere. The third part of the amendment which sought to replace the word "to" in the first line by the words "and practices and devote the necessary resources to avoid, investigate, identify, assess and", was subamended by the Workers' members by to add the words "and devote the necessary resources to" after the word "measures" to respond to the opposition by the Employers' members and several Government members who believed that the original amendment contained too many unnecessary details. In the face of continued opposition, the Workers' members withdrew this part of their amendment. At this juncture, the Employers' members introduced the second part of their amendment to replace the words "to eliminate or minimize the" by the words "aimed at eliminating or minimizing" in order to diminish the element of absolute guarantee implied by the original text. This was opposed by the Workers' members who rejected any dilution of the measures to eliminate or minimize the risks to safety and health. Their position was also endorsed by several other Government members who argued that the use of the word "minimize" provided for the required flexibility and that the terms employed by the Office text were used in national legislations. The Employers' members subsequently withdrew this part of their amendment. The discussion reverted to the fourth part of the amendment by the Workers' members which sought to replace the word "under" by the words "and mining installations within," in order to enhance the text. This was opposed by the Employers' members who believed that the definition of the term "mine" covered such mining installations, and by other Government members for the same reason, and Part 4 of the amendment was subsequently withdrawn.

62. The Employers' members introduced the third part of their amendment to the introductory lines of Point 9 by noting that the suggestion to add the word "that" at the end of the sentence was linguistic. Given the implication of this proposal on the meaning of the word "ensure" at the beginning of other clauses, the Workers' members opposed the amendment. Following similar opposition by several Government members, this part of the amendment was withdrawn. The first part of the amendment by the Employers' members sought to replace the word "necessary" by the word "reasonable" on the grounds that the latter was common practice in legal texts. This was opposed by the Workers' members so as to avoid any dilution of the meaning of the provision. The support and opposition by several Government members to this part of the amendment were based on whether or not one term or the other was used by their national legislation. After a lengthy discussion, the Government member of the United Kingdom observed that despite the use of the word "reasonable" in legislation, this term, in association with the word "minimize", amounted to a double reduction in standards and was as such not preferred. The third part of the amendment by the Employers' members was subsequently withdrawn.

63. The Employers' members introduced an amendment to delete the words "ensure that" from clause (a), and asked the Office to provide an explanation of the meaning and use of the word "ensure" in ILO instruments. The Legal Adviser of the Conference explained that the meaning of the word "ensure", which appeared in a number of international labour Conventions, depended on its place in the respective instrument and that in the case of clause (a) of Point 9, the intention was to set up an obligation of means and not an obligation of results. He further explained that within this context, measures should be taken which would not necessarily have to arrive at an absolute result, and that the text of Point 16 was applicable to each member State to take measures to implement the provisions of the Convention. He reminded the Committee that the term "ensure" could be reconsidered during the second discussion of the proposed instrument. Based on this explanation, the Employers' members withdrew their amendment. They also withdrew, for the same reason, a similar amendment introduced to clause (b).

64. The Workers' members introduced an amendment, the first part of which proposed the insertion in clause (b) the words "and decommissioned" after the word "maintained" since decommissioning constituted one of the phases of exploitation of a mine, with the second part deleting the word "and" after the word "operated". They further emphasized that decommissioning did not mean closure and that it referred to the termination of the operations when the mine was exhausted. The amendment was supported by the Employers' members and was accepted. Support was also voiced by the Government members of the United Kingdom and France who noted that "decommissioning" was not covered by the definition of the term "mine", which was accepted by the Committee, and that the French version should be referred to the Drafting Committee for finalization.

65. The Workers' members withdrew an amendment which sought to insert the words "are taken" after the word "steps", and to delete the word "take" in clause (c), based on the outcome of a previous discussion. They submitted another amendment in three parts to clause (c) the first part of which proposed the insertion of the word "adequate" before the word "steps". Following little support by Government members who believed that the term "adequate" enhanced the text and opposition by the Employers' members and several Government members who favoured the Office text, the Workers' members withdrew this part of the amendment. The second part of the amendment sought to insert the words "and monitor" after the word "maintain" to ensure consistency with other texts. The Employers' members observed that the concept of monitoring was covered by the word "maintaining," and the amendment was withdrawn. The last part of the amendment sought to insert the words "and effective roof support" after the word "ground". This was opposed by the Employers' members who observed that the provision was not applicable to open cast mines. Opposition was also voiced by several Government members on the grounds that this concern would be addressed by clause (b) of Point 21, the reference to the stability of the ground was enough to encompass the meaning of roof support and that the new addition would restrict the text. The Government member of Spain drew the attention of the Office to the need for reconsidering the use of the Spanish word which referred to the word "ground". Based on the discussion, the Workers' spokesman asked the Office to take note of the discussion, and withdrew the amendment. An amendment by the Government members of Australia, Canada, Finland, Slovenia, Sweden and the United States to replace the words "at the workplace;" by the words "in areas where persons work or travel;" was subamended by the Workers' members to add the word "may" before the word "work" to enhance the text. This was further subamended by the Government member of the member States of the EC to replace the words "may work or travel" by "have access in the context of their work". The final text as subamended read as follows: "(c) take steps to maintain the stability of the ground in areas where persons have access in the context of their work.", and was accepted.

66. An amendment by the Workers' members to insert the words "a minimum of" after the word "workplace" in clause (d) was withdrawn in favour of another amendment by the Government members of Austria, Malawi, Republic of South Africa, Zambia and Zimbabwe to replace the word "alternative" by the word "independent" in clause (d). Following a discussion on the meaning of the two words, the Government members of member States of the EC proposed a subamendment to replace the word "independent" by the word "separate". Upon the request by the Employers' members for explanation by the Office of the meaning of the terms under discussion, the Legal Adviser of the Conference noted that the terms had technical rather than legal connotations and that the interpretation of each depended on the Committee. Following a discussion which indicated that the term "separate" was more commonly used in national legislations, the amendment, as subamended, was accepted.

67. Four amendments were introduced to clause (e). The first amendment, in four parts, was introduced by the Employers' members to replace the words "ensure the monitoring" by the words "an assessment", insert the words "be undertaken" after the word "environment", insert the words "risk of exposure to" after the words "identify the" and to replace the words "to assess the level of exposure" by the words "implement appropriate ongoing monitoring". The Legal Adviser of the Conference explained that the word "ensure" in this context differed from the situation in the earlier instances in which the term was used, in that it referred to a guarantee of a result, namely the obligation to provide adequate ventilation in clause (f). He further explained that the distinction between "ensure" in clauses (b) and (e) was demonstrated by the French text which used the verb "assurer" in clause (e) and the verb "veiller" in clause (b) and noted the need to review the relationship between the two texts by the Drafting Committee or during the second discussion. In the light of this explanation, the Employers' members withdrew the amendment. The second amendment was introduced by the Government members of Australia, Canada, India, Japan, New Zealand, Turkey and the United States and sought to insert the words "and regular inspection" after the word "monitoring", replace the words "hazardous substances and agents" by the words "various hazards", replace the word "the" by the word "their" and to end the clause by the words "or that of the working environment". The amendment was aimed at broadening the requirements for employers to identify all hazards, to note that hazard identification was primarily the responsibility of the employer and to include the working environment within the scope of the provision. This was opposed by the Employers' members who believed that the amendment introduced a totally new concept. It was subamended by the Workers' members who proposed to replace the words "or that" in the last part by the words "and that". The subamendment was supported by several Government members, but was further subamended by the Employers' members to delete the words "and that of the working environment" in order to avoid redundancy of terms since the environment had already been covered in the text. This was opposed by the Government member of Japan who explained that the first reference to environment was in conjunction with monitoring, while the second related to the assessment which must include both workers and the working environment. Following a lengthy discussion, the Government member of the United Kingdom introduced an additional subamendment to insert the word "assessment" between the words "monitoring" and "and regular inspection". This was supported by the Employers' members, the Workers' members and by several other Government members and the amendment, as subamended, was adopted. Based on the earlier explanation given by the Legal Adviser of the Conference, the two amendments submitted by the Workers' members to insert the words "and detect" after the word "identify" and to insert the words "and determine" after the word "assess" in clause (e) were withdrawn.

68. An amendment by the Employers' members to replace the word "ensure" by the words "there is" in clause (f) was withdrawn in the light of the outcome of an earlier discussion of previous clauses. The Workers' members introduced an amendment in two parts to insert after the word "workings" the words "and prevent an accumulation of air containing substances hazardous to health and temperatures detrimental to health according to best practices", and to delete the words "to which access is permitted", in order to provide a more precise interpretation of the kind of ventilation required and to take account of the fact that there were other areas to which access was not permitted but which needed ventilation. The Employers' members opposed the amendment on the grounds that it was too detailed for a Convention and that it extended the scope of the instrument to include worked out mine areas and was not practical. Their opposition was echoed by several Government members, including those of Canada who argued that the leading statement in Point 9 took care of the Workers' concerns and of the member States of the EC who argued that the amendment was ambiguous and detailed and that its second part would be difficult to implement. Faced with this opposition, the Workers' members withdrew the amendment.

69. The Government members of Australia, Canada, Finland, Norway, Slovenia, Sweden and the United States introduced an amendment to add the words "such as gas outbursts, rockbursts and an inrush of water or semi-solids" after the word "hazards", so as to indicate the type of zones susceptible to hazards in clause (g). This was subamended by the Workers' members to read "such as gas outbursts, rockbursts, mine fires, inrush of water or semi-solids and natural disasters". The Employers' members opposed both the amendment and its subamendment as introducing details which were more appropriate under a Recommendation. Similar opposition was voiced by several Government members and by the Government members of member States of the EC, who supported the amendment but not the subamendment because it included natural disasters. Faced with such opposition, the Workers' members withdrew their subamendment but noted that their list of items in their subamendment was not a novelty and had appeared in other international labour Conventions. The amendment was also withdrawn by the Government member of Canada who asked the Office to note that the particular hazards referred to were enumerated in Point 24. Based on the opposition to the reference to natural disasters, the Workers' members withdrew their amendment which sought to insert the words "and prone to natural disasters" after the word "hazards" in clause (g). An amendment by the Employers' members to replace the words "so as to ensure" by the words "and procedure for" in clause (g) in order to confine the provision to a guarantee of means, was opposed by the Workers' members on the basis that the amendment changed the meaning of the clause. The Government member of Canada introduced a subamendment to maintain the words "procedures for" after the words "so as to ensure", which was accepted. The amendment, as subamended, was accepted.

70. Six amendments were introduced by the Workers' members as new clauses. The first proposed a text which read "ensure that when there is serious danger to the safety and health of workers, operations will be stopped and workers evacuated to a safe location". This was aimed at defining the employers' responsibility for the evacuation of workers. While agreeing with the concept, the Employers' members opposed the amendment on the grounds that it was covered elsewhere in the proposed instrument. Following support of the amendment by several Government members, the Employers' members introduced a subamendment which they believed captured some of the language used in other Conventions, which read as follows: "ensure that when there is an imminent and serious danger to the safety and health of workers, operations in the affected area will be stopped and that affected workers should have the right to evacuate to safe location". This was opposed by the Workers' members for the reason that it incorporated the words "right" and "affected" which referred to issues dealt with elsewhere in the instrument. Opposition was also voiced by the Government member of Canada on the grounds that the subamendment shifted the intent of the provision from the responsibility of the employer to the rights and duties of workers, a view which was endorsed by several other Government members. This led to an additional subamendment by the Employers' members who proposed to replace the words "should have the right to evacuate" by the words "will be evacuated". Faced with continued opposition to their subamendment, the Employers' members withdrew their proposal and asked the Office to note their concern, and the amendment was accepted.

71. The Workers' members introduced their second amendment to add the words "provide for constant examinations of the mines", as a new clause and subamended it by ending their amendment with the words "to ensure all necessary measures are taken to combat the formation and accumulation of explosive and toxic atmospheres". This was opposed by the Employers' members and several Government members since it addressed concepts such as inspections and monitoring which were already covered under Points 8, 9 and 11. In withdrawing the amendment, the Workers' members requested the Office to note that their concern had already been covered under other points. Their third amendment sought to introduce the following text as a new clause "make available at all times to the workers, their representatives and all those who need to have access to the mines, copies of and information on mine plans and revisions for review and response before submission to competent authorities for approval". They followed this by a subamendment deleting the words "at all times", replacing the comma after the word "workers" by the word "and", deleting the words "and all ... the mines", and the words "for review ... for approval". This was opposed by the Employers' members and by several Government members for the reason that the concern was covered elsewhere in the instrument. Following a lengthy discussion, the subamendment was rejected with 59,813 votes against, 46,397 votes in favour, with 1,677 abstentions. The fourth amendment by the Workers' members to add a new clause on the hazard control system was at their request deferred by the Committee for discussion under Point 13.

72. The fifth amendment by the Workers' members introduced the following text as a new clause "ensure that controls and measures are implemented at operating and decommissioned mines which protect the environment from damage as a result of mining operations including the control of subsidence, harmful contaminants in the water, air or ground;", in an attempt to encompass the protection of the immediate environment within the responsibility of the employer. Following a lengthy discussion during which the majority opposed the proposal on the grounds that environment was not covered by the scope of the instrument, the amendment was rejected by 61,490 votes against, 41,366 votes in favour with 4,472 abstentions.

73. The last amendment by the Workers' members introduced a new clause which read: "provide, where two means of egress do not exist, special arrangements and equipment including self-contained explosive-proof chambers to ensure the protection and safe evacuation of mineworkers in case of danger". It was opposed by the Employers' members who believed that its requirements would impede the ratification of the instrument. The Government members of member States of the EC and other Government members expressed their opposition because the provision of the prescribed equipment was not practical and provision had already been made for two means of exit. The Government member of Sweden, also speaking on behalf of the Government members of Norway and Finland, which favoured the use of safety chambers, suggested that every mine should conduct its own hazard analysis to determine the preventive measures and that it would be better to address this issue under Points 25 and 26.

Having noted the views of the majority, the Workers' members subamended their amendment by deleting the words "including self-contained explosive-proof chambers". There was continued opposition during which the Employers' members said that reference to exits did not apply to open cast mines, at which point the Workers' members submitted a fourth subamendment to add the words "in underground mines" after the word "where". Following a lengthy discussion, the second subamendment was put to vote and rejected by 54,223 votes against, 48,633 votes for, with 3,354 abstentions. The first amendment was also voted by 56,459 votes against, 45,838 votes in favour, with 4,472 abstentions, and the amendment was rejected.

74. Point 9, as amended, was adopted.

75. An amendment by the Government members of the member States of the EC proposed the addition at the end of Point 10 of the words "the employer in charge of the mine should be responsible for that coordination" in order to clearly identify the responsibility of such coordination. The Workers' members proposed a subamendment to add the words "and be held primarily responsible for the safety of the operations" and withdrew their original amendment which sought to replace the word "they" by the words "the employer which has control over the mine should be held primarily responsible for the safety of the operation and the employers". This was supported by the Employers' members and the amendment, as amended, was accepted.

76. Point 10, as amended, was adopted.

77. The Workers' members proposed to replace the introductory lines by the words "Employers should" arguing that workers faced hazards all over the mine. Following the opposition by the Employers' members, the Workers' members subamended their amendment by replacing the words "where workers" in the original text by the words "as mineworkers". Faced with opposition from the Employers' members who insisted that this section dealt with particular hazards mentioned therein, and opposition by a number of Government members, the Workers' members withdrew their amendment. In the light of this discussion, the amendment by the Government members of Australia, Canada, India, New Zealand, Poland, Slovenia, Turkey and the United States to insert the words "including those defined by national technical standards referred to in Point 6(2)" after the word "hazards" in the introductory lines was withdrawn.

78. The Workers' members introduced an amendment to clause (a) to replace the word "them" by the words "the workers of the hazards associated with and" since workers should be informed not only about health risks but about the hazards posed by their work. Following discussion, the Government member of Canada withdrew an amendment of a similar nature in favour of the amendment proposed by the Workers' members. The Employers' members supported the amendment and withdrew another amendment which they had submitted to replace the words "health risks" by the words "hazards", and the amendment was accepted.

79. The Workers' members withdrew an amendment which sought to replace in clause (b) the words "take appropriate measures to eliminate or minimize" by the words "safeguard the health and safety of workers by eliminating and where not possible minimizing" without discussion following of the outcome of the discussion of the introductory text. The second amendment to clause (b) was proposed by the Government members of Australia, Canada, Finland, India, Japan, New Zealand, Slovenia, Sweden, Turkey and the United States, for the insertion of the words" including the development and implementation of safe operating procedures" at the end of the text. Following support by the Workers' members and opposition by the Employers' members who explained that the concept was covered by the words "appropriate measures" of the Office text, the amendment was withdrawn.

80. The Workers' members proposed a new clause which read as follows: "provide and maintain at no cost to the worker suitable protective equipment facilities and protective clothing, where adequate protection against risk of accident of injury to health, including exposure to adverse conditions, cannot be ensured by other means;". The Employers' members argued that the proposal introduced details that were subject to local collective bargaining, such as the concept of "no cost", and which were not suitable for a Convention and would impede the ratification process. Following the support by the Government members of the member States of the EC and other Government members, the Employers' members withdrew their opposition, and the amendment was accepted.

81. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to add a new clause concerning the access of injured workers to medical facilities as follows: "provide for easy and rapid transportation and access for injured workers to appropriate medical facilities and hospital treatment as required;". The Employers' members opposed the amendment noting that this issue was covered by Point 8(e)(i) and Point 13. It was also opposed by the Government members of member States of the EC and other Government members for similar reasons. Following a discussion, the Employers' members introduced a subamendment which read: "provide for appropriate transportation and access for injured workers to appropriate medical facilities", which was accepted. The Government member of France noted that the words "appropriate access" should be introduced in the French version as well.

82. The Government members of Australia, Canada, Finland, India, Norway, Poland, Slovenia, Sweden, Turkey and the United States proposed a new Point relating to the rights of workers, but proposed to defer its discussion for consideration under Point 14.

83. The two amendments proposed by the Workers' and the Employers' members concerning the consultative mechanism were withdrawn without discussion.

84. An amendment by the Workers' members to replace the words "and comprehensible ... for workers" by the words "on a continuing basis during working time and safety instructions" and to add at the end ", which are comprehensible to all workers, are provided before being assigned to work" in clause (a) was opposed by the Employers' members since it restricted training to working hours. The Workers' members proposed a subamendment to retain the Office text and to insert the words "and retraining programmes during working hours" after the word "training". This was subamended by the Employers' members to delete the words "during working hours" and received support by several Government members following which the Workers' members withdrew their opposition to the subamendment by the Employers' members and the amendment, as subamended, was accepted.

85. An amendment by the Workers' members to end clause (b) by the following text: "and in particular with the obligation to specify:

(i) the object, type and frequency of inspections;

(ii) that inspections of workplaces are carried out before the workers enter them as well as on a continuing basis;

(iii) that written records of inspections, including inspection areas, findings and corrections should be drawn up and kept at the mine" was withdrawn following opposition by the majority that it was too detailed for a Convention.

86. The Workers' members withdrew their amendment which sought to introduce the concept of "time of entry" and "probable location" in clause (c) in favour of the amendment by the Government members of Australia, Canada, Finland, India, New Zealand, Norway, Poland, Slovenia, Sweden and the United States to replace the clause by the following text: "a system is established so that the names of all persons who are underground can be accurately known at any time". Following a subamendment by the Workers' members to add the words "and probable location" after the word "names", the Employers' members proposed a new subamendment, in the interests of linguistic clarity, to place the words "as well as their probable location" at the end of the clause after the words "any time". The Workers' members supported the proposal and the amendment, as subamended, was accepted.

87. Five amendments were proposed to clause (d), which were examined in parts. The first part of the amendment submitted by the Government members of Australia, Canada, Finland, India, New Zealand, Norway, Poland, Slovenia, Sweden, Turkey and United States was for the insertion of the words "mine disasters" after the word "all". The amendment was opposed by both the Employers and the Workers and was not accepted. The Committee then examined the first part of an amendment by the Workers' members to delete the words "fatal and serious" from the first line of the clause to ensure that employers at the mine investigated all accidents and occurrences. Following opposition from the Employers, who said that the content was already covered under Point 8, and a lack of consensus amongst Government members, the first part of the amendment was accepted by 54,379 votes in favour, 51,987 votes against, with no abstentions.

88. The next amendment was submitted by the Employers' members for the insertion of the words "as defined by each member State's regulations" after the word "occurrences" in the first line of the clause. The Workers' members opposed the amendment, given the use of the word "all" adopted in the previous amendment. Following a subamendment by the Government member of Canada to delete the words "fatal and serious" and to add a comma after the word "accidents", the Government member of the United Kingdom pointed out that the proposed wording would mean that all accidents, however trivial, would have to be investigated by the employer. Other Government members supported the subamendment, explaining that even minor accidents might be potentially serious. Following a lengthy discussion, the subamendment was rejected by 52,546 votes against, 50,375 votes in favour, with 1,118 abstentions. The Workers' members maintained their opposition to the original amendment submitted by the Employers' members, which was accepted by 52,632 votes in favour, 49,257 votes against, with 559 abstentions. Clause (d) as amended read: "all accidents, and dangerous occurrences as defined by each member State's own regulations are investigated as soon as possible;".

89. The Committee then examined two amendments together, both of which proposed alternative wording for the phrase "as soon as possible" in clause (d). The first amendment was submitted by the Government members of Austria, Malawi, South Africa, Zambia and Zimbabwe and proposed the use of the words "in accordance with national laws and practice". An alternative proposed by the Workers' members in the second part of an amendment to clause (d) was: "without delay and within a specified time-frame", for which there was a precedent in the Prevention of Major Industrial Accidents Convention. In the light of the views expressed by Government members that the wording proposed by the Workers' members might be an obstacle to ratification, the Workers' members withdrew their amendment in favour of the first amendment submitted by the Government members, which was accepted. The second part of an amendment presented by the Government members of Australia, Canada, Finland, India, New Zealand, Norway, Poland, Slovenia, Sweden, Turkey and United States proposed that a reference to remedial action be added at the end of the clause. It was supported by both the Employers' and the Workers' members and accepted. An amendment submitted by the Government members of the member States of the EC for a reference to be made to reporting to the competent authorities at the end of the clause was also accepted.

90. An amendment submitted by the Government members of Australia, Canada, Finland, Japan, New Zealand, Norway, Poland, Slovenia, Sweden, Turkey and the United States to replace the word "avoid" in clause (e) by the word "prevent" was adopted. Another amendment to clause (e) was submitted by the Workers' members, for the addition of the following words at the end of the clause: "as well as prohibit the introduction into or near a mine of materials which could lead to fire, explosions or other dangerous occurrences". Following a subamendment by the Workers' members to replace the word "prohibit" by the words "limit as far as possible", the Employers' members said that this would mean that the provision would even include the use of wood as support material or the presence of liquified gas as they were both potential fuel sources. Following lack of support from Government members, who said the provision was not practical, the Workers' members withdrew their amendment.

92. Two amendments were introduced to Point 13. The Employers' members proposed the insertion of the words "reasonably foreseeable" after the word "for", since it was not possible to provide for every eventuality. Following wide support from the Government members, the Workers' members withdrew their opposition and the amendment was adopted. The next amendment, which was originally submitted for Point 9 and subamended by the Workers' members, proposed to replace the entire Office text by a new provision which gave specific recognition to the need for the mining industry to establish its own criteria for emergency plans. The Employers' members believed that the subamendment contained details which were inappropriate for a Convention and which were covered elsewhere. Furthermore, they pointed out that the Office text included the words "specific to each mine", which were of crucial importance, since they addressed the unique situation in each mine. Although some Government members expressed sympathy for the Workers' views, they felt that the provisions should not be enshrined in a Convention. The amendment, as subamended by the Workers, was rejected with 65,403 votes against, 42,484 votes in favour, with 3,354 abstentions.

94. Four amendments were introduced to this Point. The first amendment, submitted and as subamended by the Workers' members, consisted of three parts. The first part of the subamendment proposed the deletion of clause (a) of the amendment and the restoration of the Office text, with the addition of the words "and in accordance with national laws and regulations" after the word "health", the insertion of the words "on the exposure" after "surveillance" and the deletion of the word "exposed" after "workers". The second part of the subamendment proposed two minor changes to clause (b) of the amendment: the replacement of the word "employers" by the word "employer" and the addition of a full stop after "programmes". The third part of the subamendment consisted of the deletion of clause (c) of the original amendment and its replacement by clause (d), with the words "workplaces" and "employers" being replaced by the words "workplace" and "employer" and the insertion of a full stop after "compensation". After a subamendment by the Employers' members to insert the words "provision of" before the word "regular" which they had sought to introduce by a separate amendment, the first part of the subamendment was adopted. The Employers' members said that they opposed the second part, since in some jurisdictions it was not the employer who provided such programmes. Furthermore the earlier reference to "national laws and practice" had given the text ample flexibility. Following lack of support for this second part of the subamendment from the Government members, the Workers' members withdrew their proposal, requesting that note be taken of their concern. The third part of the subamendment was also opposed by the Employers, who said that compensation was not a health and safety issue, but a matter of workers' compensation, for which other texts had been established. After similar views were expressed by a large number of Government members, the Workers' members withdrew this third part, and the amendment, as subamended, was accepted.

95. An amendment originally proposed to Point 11 to insert a provision on workers' rights in a new clause, submitted by the Government members of Australia, Canada, Finland, India, Norway, Poland, Slovenia, Sweden, Turkey and United States, was withdrawn after assurances by the Employers' and Workers' members that they were working on an improved wording of this principle. Based on the outcome of this discussion, the amendment of the Employers' members to insert the words "provision of" before the word "regular" was not discussed. Another amendment by the Government members of Australia, Canada, Finland, India, New Zealand, Norway, Poland, Slovenia, Sweden, the United States was also not discussed.

96. Point 14, as amended, was adopted.

New Points (after Point 14)

97. Three amendments were submitted for the introduction of a new Point. The amendment was introduced by the Workers' members on the rights of workers which they subamended by the following text to incorporate the rights of health and safety representatives, as well:

National laws and regulations pursuant to Point 6 should provide mineworkers with the following rights to be exercised without discrimination or retaliation. The procedures for the exercise of these rights shall be established by national laws and regulations and through consultations between employers, workers and their representatives.

(a) Workers
  (i) to collectively select health and safety representatives to represent them on health and safety matters;
  (ii) to report accidents and hazards to their employers and the inspectorate
  (iii) to request and obtain inspections and investigations by the competent authorities and the employers;
  (iv) to know and be informed of hazards that may affect their health or safety;
  (v) to obtain information held by the employers or the competent authorities which is relevant to their health or safety; and

(vi) to remove themselves from any location at the mine in the event that circumstances arise which appear, with reasonable justification, to pose a serious danger to the health or safety.

(b) Health and Safety Representatives

(i) to represent workers on all aspects of health and safety including the exercise of the above rights;

(ii) to conduct inspections and investigations and participate in inspections and investigations by the competent authorities and employers;

(iii) to have recourse to advisers and independent experts;

(iv) to consult in a timely fashion with the employer over health and safety matters, including policies and procedures;

(v) to consult with the competent authority; and

(vi) to be notified of accidents and dangerous occurrences, as defined by national law and regulations.

The importance of this amendment and its relevance to the issue of the workers' rights were presented by the Workers' members from Sweden, the Philippines, Ukraine, Botswana and the United States. As it was developed in consultation with the Employers' members, they gave it their support. Support to the subamendment was also voiced by several Government members, some of whom requested clarification of the text under sub-clauses (a)(ii), (b)(ii) and (b)(iii). Following clarification by the Workers' spokesman who emphasized that the rights related to all workers and representatives alike and reminded the Committee of the possibility of considering modification of the text at the second discussion of the instruments in June 1995, the amendment, as subamended, was accepted and the Chairman noted that its language would be referred to the Drafting Committee.

98. The Employers' members introduced a new Point to the proposed instrument which read as follows: "National laws or regulations should provide that workers should have the duty to:

(a) comply with the prescribed health and safety measures;

(b) take reasonable care for their own safety and health and that of other persons who may be affected by their acts or omissions at work, including the proper use of facilities and equipment placed at their disposal for this purpose; and

(c) report forthwith to their immediate supervisor any situation which they believe could present a risk, and which they cannot properly deal with themselves".

The Employers' maintained that the text captured all the provision pertaining to the duty of workers, and was identical to that of the Office text in clause (c) of Point 19. Following the support by several Government members, the Workers' members proposed a subamendment to replace the words "have the duty to" in the introductory sentence by the words "in accordance with their training" in order to place the responsibility evenly as was the case in most national legislations. This was opposed by the Employers' members on the grounds that the subamendment changed the whole intent of the proposed amendment. A new subamendment was introduced to the text by the Government member of Ireland who proposed to retain the text of the original amendment with the insertion of the words "in accordance with their training" after the word "duty". Following the support by the majority, this was accepted and the amendment, as subamended, was adopted, with the linguistic details being referred to the Drafting Committee.

99. Consequently, an amendment by the Workers' members to introduce a new Point on the rights of health and safety representatives was withdrawn.

100. The two new Points, as amended, were adopted.

Point 15

101. Point 15 was adopted without amendment.

New Point (after Point 15)

102. The Workers' members submitted an amendment for the insertion of a new Point which addressed the hazard of long hours of work to workers' safety and health. The proposal was not accepted by the Employers' members, who saw it as a matter better covered by collective agreements or other kinds of legislation. The Workers requested that due attention should be given to the workers of an industry which was one of the engines of their countries' economies and emphasized the linkage between working time and safety and health. After clarification from the Government members of Japan, India and Botswana that these concerns had been taken into account elsewhere in the text, the Workers' members withdrew their amendment.

III. Implementation

Point 16

103. The Workers' members submitted an amendment proposing replacement of the Office text by a new text requesting member States to ensure effective enforcement of the instrument by appropriate sanctions, penalties and corrective measures, to provide appropriate inspection services and to ensure that no measure be taken which resulted in a reduction in the level of safety and health protection. The amendment sought to clarify the need for the implementation and supervision of application and introduced wording similar to that used in Convention No. 155. The Employers' members believed that these concerns had already been addressed and that the obligation set out in the final part of the amendment was already contained in Article 19 (8) of the Constitution of the ILO. Following a lack of consensus amongst Government members, a subamendment by the Employers to delete the reference to "appropriate sanctions" in the first part and to insert the words "or workers" after "employers" in the third part was subamended by the Workers to retain the word "appropriate", and in turn subamended by the Employers to delete the words "afforded to workers" in the third part, since the persons to be protected might include visitors, consultant engineers or even the competent authority. The amendment, as amended, was accepted.

104. Point 16, as subamended, was adopted.

Proposed Conclusions with a view to a Recommendation

Point 17

105. The Government members of Australia, Canada, New Zealand and the United States submitted an amendment to replace the word "applied" by the word "considered". This was supported by the Employers' members since it reflected the non-binding nature of the Recommendation, but opposed by the Workers' members on the grounds that the Office text was consistent with language used in other Recommendations. Following an explanation by the Representative of the Secretary-General that Point 17 dealt with the application of the provisions of the proposed Recommendation in conjunction with those of the proposed Convention, the amendment was withdrawn.

106. Point 17 was adopted without change.

I. Scope

107. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to delete clause (a) arguing that it was not consistent with Point 4 which dealt with the exemption of certain mines. They further explained that small mines were more hazardous than big mines and that size should not be used as a criterion for exemption. While several Government and Employers' members concurred with this view, the Employers' members opposed the amendment on the grounds that such a detailed list was appropriate for a Recommendation. After a long discussion the amendment was accepted by 69,359 votes in favour, 27,219 against, with 7,482 abstentions. Based on this outcome, the amendment by the Employers' members to replace the word "or" by the word "and" was not discussed.

108. An amendment by the Workers' members to delete clause (b) on the grounds that it was covered by sub-clause 4(b)(i) was opposed by the Employers' members and by several Government members and subsequently withdrawn.

109. The Workers' members submitted two amendments for new paragraphs concerning the applications of the provisions of the Convention and the Recommendation, and the consultative mechanism between employers' and workers' organizations. The amendments were opposed by the Employers' members and subsequently withdrawn.

110. Point 18, as amended, was adopted.

II. General provisions

Point 19

111. The Employers' members submitted and withdrew without discussion an amendment which proposed to replace the word "and", after the word "workers" by the word "and/or" in the introductory lines.

112. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to replace clause (a) by the following text: "consultation and cooperation between employers, workers and their representatives should be organized to promote safety and health in mines and should be prescribed by national laws and regulations or by the competent authorities in order to include measures to promote:

(i) the establishment of safety and health committees, with equal representation of employers and workers with such powers and functions as may be prescribed including powers for joint and regular inspections;

(ii) provision for workers' safety and health representatives with powers and functions as may be required;

(iii) the appointment by the employer of suitably qualified and experienced persons to promote safety and health;

(iv) the training of workers' safety and health representatives;

(v) training and health safety awareness programmes for workers; and

(vi) exchange of information and experiences on safety and health in mines".

Following opposition by the Employers' members on the grounds of redundancy, the Workers' members proposed the deletion of sub-clause (ii), and the amendment, as subamended, was accepted. Based on this outcome, the three other amendments introduced to clause (a) by the Government members of Australia, Canada, Finland, Japan, New Zealand, Poland, Slovenia, Sweden and the United States; by the Government of China and by the Employers' members, were not discussed. An amendment by the Government members of Australia, Finland, Japan, New Zealand, Norway, Papua New Guinea, Poland, Sweden, Turkey and the United States, another by the Government members of Australia, Canada, Finland, Japan, New Zealand, Norway, Poland, Slovenia, Sweden and the United States, and a third by the Emloyers' members to replace the word "and" after the word "workers" by the words "and/or" in clause (b)(i) were withdrawn.

113. The Government members of Australia, Finland, Japan, New Zealand, Norway, Papua New Guinea, Poland, Sweden, Turkey and the United States, and the Government of members of Australia, Canada, Finland, Japan, New Zealand, Norway, Poland, Slovenia, Sweden and the United States withdrew their two similar amendments seeking to replace the word "workers" in clause (b)(ii) by the words "workers and/or their" without discussion. The Workers' member also withdrew an amendment to this sub-clause without discussion since their concern had already been addressed by a previous discussion on the rights of workers. The Workers' members withdrew without discussion three additional amendments proposed as new sub-clauses under clause (b) which addressed provisions already covered under a previous point on the rights of workers.

114. The Government members of Malawi, Zambia and Zimbabwe withdrew without discussion an amendment which sought to insert the words "in accordance with their training" after the word "should" in clause (c). The next amendment was submitted by the Employers' members seeking the addition of the words "have a duty to" after the word "should" in the introductory line of clause (c), who further subamended the amendment by proposing the deletion of sub-clauses (i), (ii) and (iii) as the issue was going to be addressed by a text they intended to propose as a new sub-clause under this Point. This was subamended by the Workers' members who proposed to replace the word "workers" by the words "all persons", so that the text would read: "All persons should have a duty to ...". The proposal was accepted by the Employers' members and adopted. In the light of the outcome of the debate, there was no discussion of the amendments presented by the Government members of Australia, Canada, Finland, India, Japan, Norway, Poland, Sweden, Turkey and the United States on clause (c)(i) and by the Employers' members on clause (c)(ii).

115. An amendment was presented by the Employers' members to insert a new sub-clause under clause (c) as follows: "refrain from disconnecting, changing or removing arbitrarily safety devices fitted to machinery, equipment, appliances, tools, plant and buildings, and use such safety devices correctly;", and was supported by the Workers' members and accepted.

116. Point 19, as amended, was adopted.

New Point (after Point 19)

117. An amendment by the Employers' members to add a new Point after Point 19 as: "The competent authority should have properly qualified and trained staff with the appropriate skills, and sufficient technical and professional support, to inspect, investigate, assess and advise on the matters dealt with in the Convention and to ensure compliance with national laws and regulations.", to highlight the role of the competent authority was supported by the Workers' members, and accepted after a clarification by the Employers' members to a question raised by the Government member of Malawi that the provision sought to draw a distinction between institutional capacity of the competent authorities as opposed to personnel competence.

118. The new Point was adopted.

119. Point 20 was adopted without amendment.

III. Preventive and protective measures

Point 21

120. The Employers' members withdrew an amendment to the introductory lines of the Office text. Three amendments were presented by the Workers' members to add the words "monitor and" before the word "control" in sub-clause (a), to replace the word "support" by the words "provide effective support of" in sub-clause (b) and to add the words "and floor" and delete the word "and" after the word "roof" in the first line of sub-clause (b). The amendments were supported by the Employers' members and adopted. The language editing of the French version was referred to the Drafting Committee. The Employers' members withdrew an amendment to replace the word "controlled" by the word "planned" in sub-clause (b).

121. The Workers' members presented two amendments for the addition of new clauses. The first proposed the text: "monitor and control the sides of surface mines to prevent fall or slide of material into the pit endangering workers", was accepted by the Employers' members. The second amendment, which was subamended by the Workers' members to read: "ensure that dams, lagoons, tailings and other such impoundments should be adequately designed and controlled to prevent dangers from sliding material or collapse", was also supported by the Employers' members, accepted, and referred to the Drafting Committee for language editing in French.

122. Point 2l, as amended, was adopted.

New Point (after Point 2l)

123. There were three proposals to introduce a new Point after Point 21 by the Workers' members. The first was subamended by the Workers' members to read: "Pursuant to point 9(b), where appropriate mine facilities should include sufficient fire-proof and self-contained chambers to provide refuge for miners in the event of an emergency." This was supported by the Employers' members and accepted. The Workers' members withdrew their second amendment for a new Point in the light of the provisions adopted in the proposed Convention and their third amendment, as subamended by them to add a new Point on measures by employers to minimize risks within mines and mining installations in the light of the agreed provisions of Point 9.

124. The new Point, as amended, was adopted.

125. There were three amendments to this Point. The Workers' members presented an amendment to replace the entire Office text by the following: "Arrangements pursuant to Point 9(f) should ensure that all mine workings which are not cordoned off by suitable means should be constantly ventilated, with an adequate safety margin, in an appropriate manner to keep those parts in a fit state for persons to work or pass through and ensure in particular that:

(i) the atmosphere should comply with international standards on dusts, gases and contaminants and should aim at being as low a level as is achievable;

(ii) a healthy atmosphere in which the risks of explosions and the levels of respirable dusts are kept under control;

best copy available

(iii) an atmosphere in which working conditions are adequate while work is in progress, having regard to the working method being used and the physical demand placed on the workers;".

The Workers' members presented a subamendment to refer to mine workings to which workers have access and other areas as necessary and, in clause (i), to replace the word "international" by "national" and the final part of the clause by a reference to climatic conditions. The Government members of the member States of the EC proposed a subamendment to replace the words "all mines" by "underground mines", in the light of the provisions of Point 9(f). Following a lengthy discussion during which the Government member of India proposed a subamendment to delete clauses (ii) and (iii), which was not accepted, the Employers' members proposed a further subamendment to delete the words "with an adequate safety margin" and "healthy" and the reference to "and the levels of respirable dusts", which the Workers' members accepted. The amendment, as subamended, was accepted and read as follows: "Arrangements pursuant to point 9(f) should ensure that all underground mine workings to which workers have access and other areas as necessary are ventilated in an appropriate manner to ensure:

(i) that the atmosphere comply with national standards on dusts, gases and climatic conditions;

(ii) an atmosphere in which the risks of explosions are kept under control;

(iii) an atmosphere in which working conditions are adequate while work is in progress, having regard to the working method being used and the physical demand placed on the workers;".

In the light of the debate there was no discussion of an amendment presented by the Government members of Australia, Canada, Finland, New Zealand, Norway, Sweden, Turkey and the United States and an amendment presented by the Employers' members.

126. Point 22, as amended, was adopted.

127. The Government members of the member States of the EC presented an amendment to delete the word "mineral" from clause (l)(a), which was supported by the Employers' and Workers' members and accepted.

128. There were two amendments presented to clause (1)(b). The Workers' members presented an amendment to insert the words "blackdamp, carbon monoxide" after the word "firedamp", which the Employers' members subamended to delete the word "blackdamp", which they said meant an oxygen deficient atmosphere. The Workers' members explained that their original amendment had been based on traditional and historic terms and supported the subamendment, which was accepted. The second amendment was submitted by the Government members of Australia, Canada, Finland, India, New Zealand, Norway, Papua New Guinea, Poland, Slovenia and Sweden to replace the word "firedamp" by the word "methane". The Government member of the United States submitted a subamendment to replace the entire amended sub-clause by the words "flammable, explosive, toxic, noxious and other mine gases", which was supported by both the Employers' and Workers' members. The amendment, as subamended, was accepted.

129. The Government members of the member States of the EC presented an amendment to clause (1)(c) to insert after the word "toxic" the words "gases and". The proposal was accepted by the Employers' and Workers' members and adopted. The Government members of Austria, Malawi, Zambia and Zimbabwe presented an amendment to clause (1)(d) to add the following words: ", equipment or other substances". The Workers' members proposed a subamendment to replace the word "substances" by the word "sources", which was accepted, and the amendment, as subamended, was accepted.

130. Two amendments were presented to add new clauses to paragraph (1). The Government members of Australia, Canada, Finland, India, New Zealand, Norway, Papua New Guinea, Poland, Slovenia and Sweden proposed the addition of three new clauses as follows: "those associated with manual handling; rockbursts and rockfalls; and those related to work carried out near dangerous openings;". The Employers' members opposed the amendment, saying that the hazards did not fall within this Point since they were not physical, biological or chemical hazards. The Government members of the member States of the EC expressed a similar view and the Government member of the United Kingdom presented a subamendment to delete the last two new clauses. The proposal was accepted by the Employers' and Workers' members and the amendment, as subamended, was accepted. The second amendment to add a new clause to paragraph (1) was presented by the Workers' members, who requested that discussion of the first four proposed clauses be deferred to Point 24. This was accepted by the Employers' members, who also proposed a subamendment to delete the first of the other four clauses, which was accepted by the Workers' members and supported by the Government members, and the amendment, as subamended, was accepted. As amended, the new clauses read: "high levels of humidity; exhaust fumes from diesel equipment; oxygen deficiencies; those resulting from a combination of the risks enumerated above".

131. The first amendment to clause (2)(a) presented by the Government members of Australia, Canada, Finland, India, New Zealand, Norway, Papua New Guinea, Poland and Slovenia for the replacement of the words "and organizational by the words "and/or engineering" was withdrawn after discussion. The second amendment was proposed by the Workers' members for the addition of the word "appliances" after the word "equipment" in the second line of the clause. It was supported by the Employers' members and accepted.

132. Five amendments were proposed to paragraph 2 clause (b). Two amendments by the Government members of Australia, Canada, Finland, India, New Zealand, Norway, Papua New Guinea, Poland and Slovenia were withdrawn in the light of the previous discussion. An amendment by the Employers' members to delete the words "where it is not possible to have recourse to (a) above," was withdrawn, following opposition from the Workers' members and Government members. Two identical amendments by the Workers' members to add the words "at no cost to the worker" at the end of the clause were adopted after the Employers' members withdrew their opposition on the grounds that Point 11(c) already covered this issue, following opposition from the Government and Workers' members.

133. The Workers' members introduced a new clause under paragraph (2) regarding the protection of the reproductive health of women workers who now accounted for an increasing share of the workforce in the mining industry. It was opposed by the Employers' members, who considered that this was a social matter outside the scope of the proposed instruments. A motion by the Workers' members to adjourn the discussion to the next sitting, which was opposed by the Employers' members, was adopted by 49,166 votes in favour, 12,857 votes against with 3,354 abstentions. The discussion was adjourned to the next sitting, when the Workers' members proposed a subamendment to extend the provisions to "all workers". The Employers' members opposed the subamendment and proposed the setting up of an informal group to examine the proposal in conjunction with a proposed subamendment from the Employers' members. Following discussions by this informal group, the Workers' members further amended the text to read: "where reproductive health hazards and risks have been identified special organizational, training and technical measures be adopted including the right of removal to alternate work where appropriate without any loss of salary, especially during health risk periods such as pregnancy and breast feeding", and the proposal, as subamended, was accepted.

134. The Workers' members introduced a second new clause under paragraph (2) which read: "constant monitoring and inspection of areas where the hazards are present or likely to be present", and subamended, in the light of discussion regarding the difficulty associated with the use of the word "constant" by replacing it by the word "regular". This was opposed by the Employers' members on the grounds that it was a repetition of the provision in Point 9 clause (e) under the Convention, which was unnecessary since the provisions of the proposed Recommendation should be applied in conjunction with those of the proposed Convention as stipulated in Point 17, which the Committee adopted. This led to a request for legal advice which the Office provided by explaining that the adoption of the Convention leads to a binding obligation when it enters into force, and that the Recommendation supplements the Convention in two ways. It either provides guidance as to how to apply a provision of the Convention, or it addresses a subject which did not lend itself to arriving at an obligation in a Convention. As far as the repetition of a Convention text in a Recommendation, two examples could be cited. The first is where the Recommendation contains the same provisions as those in the Convention and the second where it is stated, as in Point 17, that the provisions of the Recommendation should be applied in conjunction with those of the Convention. The latter was a drafting technique to keep the Recommendation shorter, but the Committee was free to decide on the contents of each instrument. Even under the Scope, Definition and Means of Application, the Committee was free to decide to what extent the two instruments might be the same or differ. The representative of the Legal Adviser also pointed out that the reference made by the Recommendation to the Convention could be either explicit or implicit. Following the advice given, the subamendment was supported, and the proposal, as subamended, was accepted.

135. Point 23, as amended, was adopted.

136. Five amendments were introduced to this Point. An amendment by the Employers' members to insert the words "and procedures" after the word "plan" was withdrawn without discussion on the grounds that the provisions of the Recommendation were to be applied in conjunction with those of the Convention. The Government members of Australia, Canada, Finland, Japan, New Zealand, Norway, Poland, Slovenia, Sweden and the United States proposed an amendment to insert the words "underground mine fires" after the word "include" and withdrew it in favour of the first part of an amendment by the Workers' members which sought to insert the words "ventilation, roof control, mine fire" after the word "include". This was opposed by the Employers' members who introduced a subamendment by replacing the text with the words "underground mine fires", which was accepted. Since natural disasters had already been covered by Point 13, the Workers' members withdrew the second part of their amendment which addressed this subject, and their amendment, as subamended, was accepted.

137. The fourth amendment by the Workers' members to include part of an amendment deferred from Point 23 that had nine parts; only four of which were tabled at this stage as proposals for new clauses. It was subamended by the Workers' members to read "rockfalls", which was supported and accepted. The second part was also subamended by the Workers members to read: "areas prone to seismic movement", and was supported and accepted. The third and fourth parts which read: "those related to work carried out near dangerous openings", and "those related to work performed under extremely difficult geological circumstances" respectively, were also supported and accepted. The decision as to whether these four parts should stand as clauses or sub-paragraphs was left to the Drafting Committee. The last amendment to this Point proposed by the Government members of the member States of the EC was referred to the Drafting Committee for reconsideration of the French text.

138. Point 24, as amended, was adopted.

139. Three amendments were introduced to this Point. The first amendment was submitted by the Workers' members to replace the words "could include ... emergency response" by the words "should include:" and to add six new clauses. This was subamended by the Employers' members who proposed to replace the word "should" by the word "could", delete the clause which dealt with emergency medical procedures and replace the word "evaluation" by the word "evacuation" and the words "serious danger" by the words "an emergency" in the third clause so that the whole text would read as follows: "could include:

(a) effective site emergency plans;

(b) provision for the cessation of work and evacuation of the workforce in the event of an emergency;

(c) adequate training in the use of emergency procedures and equipment;

(d) adequate protection of the public and the environment;

(e) provision of information to, and consultation with, relevant bodies and organizations."

This was supported by the Workers' members and the amendment, as subamended, was accepted. In the light of this outcome, two other amendments by the Workers' and Employers' members to the Office text were not discussed.

140. Point 25, as amended, was adopted.

New Point (before Point 25)

141. The Workers' members submitted an amendment as a new Point before Point 25 which addressed the consultative mechanism on working hours, night work, shift work, rest periods, annual holidays and education and training, in four clauses, arguing that such detail was relevant to the Recommendation, and stressing the need to address working hours and rest periods in view of the effects of fatigue on the safety and health of mineworkers. This was opposed by the Employers' members on the grounds that the issues addressed were not specific to the mining sector and were matters for collective bargaining that were dealt with in separate national legislation. Several Government members thought that not all these issues were appropriate to this Point. Several other Government members supported the view that working hours and rest periods were issues related to safety and health, following which the Workers' members subamended the text by deleting clauses and changing the text of the amendment to read: "The consultations provided for by Point 7 should include consultations with the most representative organizations of employers and workers over the effect on miners'. health and safety of the length of working hours, night work and shift work. After such consultations, each member State should take the necessary measures in relation to working time, and in particular:

(a) maximum daily working hours;

(b) minimum daily rest periods;".

This was supported by the Employers' members and the amendment, as subamended, was accepted.

142. The new Point, as amended, was adopted.

Point 26

143. An amendment by the Workers' members to replace the word "a" by the word "an appropriate" in clause (e) was supported and accepted. The Government members of the member States of the EC proposed a new clause to read "( ) provisions and maintenance of means of escape and rescue", which was supported and accepted. This was followed by another proposal by the Workers' members as a new clause addressing mine rescue teams, medical attention to workers information on previous incidents, training, first-aid facilities and international cooperation and the protection of miners, which they further subamended to delete the reference to first-aid and detailed information as follows:

( ) establishment of a mine rescue team, periodic medical assessment of suitability and regular training for the persons of the mine rescue team;

( ) transportation to medical attention of workers who have suffered from work-place injury or illness at no cost to the worker;

( ) training of workers and participation in drills;

( ) measures to promote international cooperation and the protection of miners.

This was supported and the proposal, as subamended, was accepted.

144. Point 26, as amended, was adopted.

New Points (after Point 26)

145. The Workers' members introduced six proposals to add new Points after Point 26. The first, which addressed pre-shift inspections, was supported and accepted to read:

In implementing Point 12(b), employers should:

(a) ensure that pre-shift inspections take place at each workplace, machinery, equipment and appliances therein;

(b) keep written records of pre-shift inspections, defects and corrective measures and make them available at the mine.

146. The new Point was adopted without amendment.

147. The second proposal, which was pursuant to Point 8(c), was withdrawn without discussion since the provisions had already been covered elsewhere in the instrument. The third proposal, which was pursuant to Point 12(e) was subamended by the Workers' members, following opposition on grounds of impracticability, by the Employers' members to read: "Measures that employers could take to implement point 12(e) should include, where applicable, the prevention of persons carrying underground any item, object or substance which could initiate a fire, explosion or dangerous occurrence.", and the proposal, as subamended, was accepted.

148. The new Point, as amended, was adopted.

149. The fourth proposal, which was pursuant to Point 8(e)(ii), was subamended by the Government member of Canada to add the word "gas" before the word "outburst" which was supported to read: "In pursuance of Point 8(e)(ii) requirements could cover the specifications of the type of self-rescuers to be provided, and in particular, in the case of mines prone to gas outbursts, the provision of self-contained respiratory devices.", and the proposal, as subamended, was accepted.

150. The new Point, as amended, was adopted.

151. The fifth proposal, which was pursuant to Point 8(e), was supported and accepted to read: "In pursuance of Point 8(e) requirements could cover the obligations of the suppliers of mining equipment and appliances as far as the safe labelling of products and clarity of instructions is concerned."

152. The new Point was adopted without amendment.

153. The last proposal, which was pursuant to Point 8(b), was introduced along with clarifications concerning the meaning of the examinations of the mine for the employer, the word "certification" and the coverage of the word "persons". Following support by the Employers' members on the grounds that the word "could" in the provisions provided for flexibility, the proposal was accepted.

154. The new Point was adopted without amendment.

Point 27

155. An amendment by the Employers' members to commence the introductory statement by the words "where appropriate" to enhance flexibility was supported and accepted. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to replace clauses (a) and (b) by:

(a) sufficient and gender specific suitable toilets, showers, wash basins and laundry facilities;
(b) adequate supplies of wholesome drinking water in suitable places and properly maintained;
(c) adequate facilities for the changing, storage, laundering and drying of clothes; and
(d) adequate and hygienic accommodation for taking meals.

This was supported by the Employers' members and was accepted. Based on this result, an amendment by the Workers' members to end clause (b) with the words "at no cost to the workers" was not discussed.

156. Point 27, as amended, was adopted.

New Points (after Point 27)

157. The Workers' members introduced eight proposals to add new Points after Point 27. The first, which was pursuant to the Point dealing with the right of workers to remove themselves from conditions which they believed endangered their safety and health, was opposed by the Employers' members. The proposal was subamended by the Workers' members to read as follows:

Pursuant to Point ... procedures could include requirements for:
(a) notifying supervisors and safety representatives of the danger;
(b) if the issue cannot be resolved, participation by senior representatives of the employer and representatives of the workers in endeavouring to resolve the issue;
(c) where necessary, participation by a representative of the competent authority to assist in the resolution;
(d) for the worker to suffer no loss of pay and, where appropriate, to be assigned suitable alternative work;
(e) for the notification of any worker who is requested to perform work in the area concerned of the danger and the fact that a worker has refused to work in the area.

The Employers' members expressed their support and the proposal, as subamended, was accepted.

158. The new Point, as amended, was adopted.

159. The second proposal presented by the Workers' members for a new Point pursuant to Point 16 was withdrawn in the light of the provisions already adopted.

160. The third proposal which addressed the rights afforded to workers' safety representatives, was subamended by the Workers' members to read:

Pursuant to Point .., where appropriate, the rights afforded to worker safety representatives should include:

(a) the right to appropriate training during working time without loss of pay on their rights and functions as a safety representative and on health and safety matters;

(b) the right to appropriate facilities necessary to perform their functions;

(c) the right to receive their normal pay for all time spent performing their rights and functions as safety representatives;

(d) the right to assist and advise a worker who has withdrawn from a workplace because he believes his health or safety is endangered.

It was supported by the Employers' members and subsequently accepted and referred to the Drafting Committee to resolve the gender specific wording as proposed by the Government member of Australia.

161. The new Point, as amended, was adopted.

162. The fourth proposal, which was pursuant to Point 15, was supported and accepted to read:

Pursuant to Point 15, measures should be taken to encourage and promote:

(a) research and exchange of information into safety and health in mines at national and international level;

(b) specific assistance to small undertakings with a view to assist in technical transfer of know-how, the establishment of preventive health and safety programmes and the encouragement of cooperation and consultation with workers and their representatives.

163. The new Point was adopted without amendment.

164. The fifth proposal addressed workers' rights, which the Workers' members subamended to read as follows: "National laws and regulations should provide that no employer should discriminate or retaliate against any worker who exercises any right accorded to workers by national legislation or regulation or by the competent authority or agreed upon by the employer and the representative of the workers." After a request for clarification from the Employers' members as to what these rights might be, the Employers' members supported the subamendment and the proposal, as subamended, was accepted.

165. The new Point, as amended, was adopted.

166. The sixth proposal was for the addition of a new Point as follows: "In implementing the measures contained within the Convention and Recommendation due regard should be given to the possible impact on the environment and on public safety of mining activity. In particular this should include the control of subsidence, vibrations, harmful contaminants in the water, air or ground and the safe and effective management of waste tips and rehabilitation of mine sites." The Employers' members said that such concerns were more appropriately addressed by environmental legislation. In response to the Government member of Nigeria to limit the provision to the "near" environment, the Workers' members made a subamendment to add the word "surrounding" before the word "environment". Following the wide support expressed by Government members for the proposal, the Employers' members withdrew their opposition and the proposal was accepted.

167. The new Point, as amended, was adopted.

168. The seventh proposal for a new Point was subamended by the Workers' members by inserting the words "where appropriate" after the words "Pursuant to Point ...." to read:

Pursuant to Point ..., where appropriate, the information that workers and their representatives should receive includes:

(a) reports on inspections conducted by the competent authority or the employer including inspections of machinery or equipment;

(b) copies of orders or instructions issued by the competent authority in respect of matters that affect health and safety;

(c) reports on accidents, injuries, instances of ill health and other occurrences affecting health and safety prepared by either the competent authority or the employer;

(d) information on all hazards at work including hazardous, toxic or harmful materials, agents or substances used at the mine;

(e) all notices of hazards to the health and safety of workers;

(f) any other documentation concerning health and safety that the employer is required to maintain;

(g) immediate notification of accidents and other dangerous occurrences;

(h) where practicable, notice of any visit to the mine by a representative of the competent authority;

(i) any health studies conducted in respect of hazards present in the workplace.

The subamendment was accepted by the Employers' members. Several Government members expressed their concern about clauses (a), (b) and (c) and the practical and financial implications of the provisions, as well as of the legal difficulties posed by the release of confidential documents and reports. Prior notice of visits by the competent authority was not announced. The Workers' members stated that it was for these reasons that they had submitted their subamendment. The amendment, as subamended, was accepted.

169. The new Point, as subamended, was adopted.

170. The last proposal was subamended by the Workers' members to read:

Where appropriate the programmes of health surveillance contained in Point 14 should:

(a) provide the opportunity to undergo medical examination prior to or just after commencing work and thereafter on a continuing basis;

(b) provide, where possible, for reintegration and/or rehabilitation of workers unable to undertake their normal duties due to occupational injury or illness;

(c) preclude any discrimination or retaliation against workers as a result of their participation;

(d) be free of charge to workers.

The Employers' members supported the subamendment, which was also supported by several Government members although they thought that such medical examinations should be mandatory and carried out prior to work. The Government member of Canada said that pre-placement, as opposed to pre-employment medicals were discriminatory under law in his country, and for that reason he supported the wording of the amendment. The Workers' members said that since the mining industry was very broad, medical examinations may not be necessary for all workers. The proposal, as subamended, was accepted.

171. The new Point, as amended, was adopted.

Adoption of the report including the Proposed Conclusions and a resolution

172. At its fourteenth sitting, the Committee adopted its report, subject to some changes requested by some of its members, as well as corrections of typographical errors.

173. At the same sitting, the Committee adopted the proposed Conclusions as presented at the end of the report. Upon the request of the Workers' spokesman, the representative of the Legal Adviser of the Conference clarified the reasons why the Drafting Committee had deleted clause (c) from an amendment the Committee had accepted in the text of the present Point 20. Clause (c) would have provided that each member should: "ensure that no measure should be taken by a member State, employers or workers, in pursuance of the provisions of this Convention; which results in a reduction of the level of health and safety protection in mines under existing national laws and regulations at the time of ratification of the standards under consideration." She pointed out that after a lengthy discussion, the Drafting Committee had decided that this clause could be deleted without loss to anyone. The Office of the Legal Adviser had objected to the inclusion of clause (c) for the following reasons. First of all, Article 19(8) of the ILO Constitution contains language which already provides for the protection being sought in clause (c). Conventions adopted since that provision was added to the Constitution, have not included clauses such as clause (c). Secondly, the wording of clause (c) posed several other problems. It could lead to a misunderstanding that States would be precluded from making any change in laws and regulations after having ratified the proposed Convention. Regarding the reference to "employers or workers", in clause (c), she noted that their actions would be governed by national laws and regulations and that Point 9 of the Conclusions stated that the Convention was to be applied by such national laws and regulations.

174. The Committee unanimously adopted a resolution to place on the agenda of the next Ordinary Session of the Conference an item entitled: "Safety and Health in Mines".

175. A Workers' member, speaking on behalf of the International Organization of Miners, which recently became the International Organization of Mines and Energy, declared that, in his view, by striving to elaborate instruments which would be sufficiently flexible to be ratified by governments, the Committee had not given due consideration to essential proposals on social protection, conditions and hours of work, the environment, the real involvement of workers in safety and health matters, the independence of enforcing bodies, and the establishment of reliable statistical tools to monitor the application of standards. He hoped, therefore, that these issues would be raised again during the second discussion.

176. The Employers' Vice-Chairman thanked the Committee, its Chairman, the Secretariat and the Committee Drafting Committee for their work, which he said had once again confirmed the value of tripartism as a means of sharing perspectives. He also thanked the Legal Adviser for the assistance rendered and stressed that one of the most fruitful ways of promoting the safety and health of mineworkers was to develop instruments capable of widespread ratification.

177. The Workers' Vice-Chairman expressed his thanks to the Governing Body for placing the item on the agenda of the Conference and to the Committee, its Chairman, the Secretariat and the Legal Adviser for their assistance and spirit of cooperation. In stressing that this was a first discussion, he said that it had been a learning experience of considerable value for future work. He also expressed his congratulations to the Workers' member of South Africa for his contribution to the work of the Drafting Committee and for the demise of apartheid in his country.

178. The Chairman thanked the three groups for their constructive work which was reflected in the fact that the Committee had never felt it necessary to set up any formal working group. The Committee had effectively completed its tasks, with the guidance of the Committee Drafting Committee. He called on members to pursue their work during the coming year in preparation for the second discussion.

Proposed Conclusions

Form of the international instruments

1. The International Labour Conference should adopt international standards concerning safety and health in mines.

2. These standards should take the form of a Convention supplemented by a Recommendation.

Preamble

3. These standards should contain a Preamble referring to relevant ILO instruments which might include the following existing instruments: the Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957; the Radiation Protection Convention and Recommendation, 1960; the Guarding of Machinery Convention and Recommendation, 1963; the Minimum Age (Underground Work) Convention and Recommendation, 1965 and the Medical Examination of Young Persons (Underground Work) Convention, 1965; the Working Environment (Air Pollution, Noise and Vibration) Convention and Recommendation, 1977; the Occupational Safety and Health Convention and Recommendation, 1981; the Occupational Health Services Convention and Recommendation, 1985; the Asbestos Convention and Recommendation, 1986; the Safety and Health in Construction Convention and Recommendation, 1988; the Chemicals Convention and Recommendation, 1990; the Prevention of Major Industrial Accidents Convention and Recommendation, 1993.

4. The Preamble should also:

(a) note that workers have a need for, and right to, information, genuine consultation, participation and training concerning the hazards and risks they face in the mining industry;

(b) note that it is essential to prevent or reduce the incidence of fatalities, illnesses and injuries in the mining industry;

(c) note that the provision of safe mining conditions enhances the protection of the general public and the environment;

(d) have regard to the need for cooperation between the International Labour Organization, the World Health Organization, the International Atomic Energy Agency and other relevant institutions and note the relevant instruments, codes of practice, codes and guidelines promulgated by these organizations.

Definitions

5. For the purposes of these standards, the term "mine" should cover:

(a) surface or underground sites where the following activities, in particular, take place:

   (i) exploration for minerals involving the mechanical disturbance of the ground or the extraction of minerals;

(ii) preparation, including crushing, grinding, concentration or washing of the extracted minerals; and

(b) all machinery, equipment, appliances, buildings and civil engineering structures used in conjunction with the activities referred to in (a) above.

6. For the purposes of these standards, the term "employer" means any physical or legal person who employs or who contracts for the services of one or more workers in a mine, and as the context requires, a contractor.

Proposed Conclusions with a view to a Convention

I. Scope and means of application

7. The Convention should:

(a) cover all mines;

(b) provide that the competent authority of each Member, after consulting the most representative organizations of employers and workers concerned,

  (i) may exclude from the application of the Convention certain categories of mines according to criteria to be established by the competent authority so long as the safety and health of workers are not compromised;

  (ii) in the case of the exclusion of certain categories of mines pursuant to clause (i) above, make plans for covering progressively all mines;

(c) provide that each Member which ratifies the Convention and avails itself of the possibility afforded in clause (b)(i) above, should indicate in the first report on the application of the Convention submitted under article 22 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organization, any particular category of mines thus excluded and the reasons for the exclusion.

8. In the light of national conditions and practice and after consultation with the most representative organizations of employers and workers concerned, each Member should formulate, carry out and periodically review a coherent policy on safety and health in mines, particularly with regard to the measures to give effect to the provisions of the Convention.

9. (1) The Convention should provide that the measures for ensuring its application should be prescribed by national laws and regulations.

(2) Where appropriate, these national laws and regulations should be supplemented by technical standards, guidelines or codes of practice, as determined by the competent authority.

10. National laws and regulations pursuant to Point 9 should:

(a) designate the competent authority or authorities to monitor and regulate the various aspects of safety and health in mines;

(b) provide for:

  (i) the supervision of safety and health in mines;

  (ii) the inspection of mines;

(iii) the procedures for reporting and investigation of mine disasters, fatal and serious accidents, and dangerous occurrences, as defined by such national laws or regulations;

(iv) the compilation and publication of statistics on occupational diseases, accidents and dangerous occurrences, as defined by such national laws or regulations;

(v) the competent authority to have the power to suspend or restrict mining activities on safety and health grounds, until such time as the condition giving rise to the suspension or restriction has been corrected;

(vi) the establishment of effective procedures to ensure the implementation of the right of workers and their representatives to participate and be consulted on safety and health at the workplace;

(c) provide that employers prepare appropriate plans of workings before the start of operation and in the event of any significant modification; the plans should be brought up to date periodically and be available at the mine site;

(d) provide that the storage, transport and use of explosives and initiating devices should be carried out by or under the direct supervision of trained and authorized persons;

(e) specify:

(i) requirements relating to mine rescue, first aid and appropriate medical facilities;

(ii) an obligation to provide self-rescue respiratory devices for workers in underground coal mines and, where necessary, for workers in underground non-coal mines;

(iii) protective measures to be taken for the securing of abandoned mine workings so as to minimize risks to safety and health; and

(iv) requirements for the safe storage, transportation and disposal of waste.

II. Preventive and protective measures at the mine

11. Employers should take all necessary measures to eliminate or minimize the risks to safety and health in mines under their control, and in particular:

(a) ensure that the mine is designed, constructed and provided with electrical, mechanical and other equipment, including a communication system, to secure safety in its operation and a healthy working environment;

(b) ensure that the mine is commissioned, operated, maintained and decommissioned in such a way that workers can perform the work assigned to them without endangering their safety and health or that of other persons;

(c) take steps to maintain the stability of the ground in areas where persons have access in the context of their work;

(d) provide, whenever practicable from every underground workplace, two exits, each of which should be connected to separate means of egress to the surface;

(e) ensure the monitoring, assessment and regular inspection of the working environment to identify the various hazards to which the workers may be exposed and to assess their level of exposure;

(f) ensure adequate ventilation for all underground workings to which access is permitted;

(g) in respect of zones susceptible to particular hazards, draw up and implement an operating plan and procedures so as to ensure a safe system of work and the protection of workers; and

(h) ensure that when there is serious danger to the safety and health of workers, operations are stopped and workers are evacuated to a safe location.

12. Whenever two or more employers undertake activities at the same mine, they should coordinate the implementation of all measures concerning the safety and health of workers. The employer in charge of the mine should undertake that coordination and be held primarily responsible for the safety of the operations.

13. Where workers are exposed to physical, chemical or biological hazards the employer should:

(a) inform the workers of the hazards associated with their work and of the health risks involved;

(b) take appropriate measures to eliminate or minimize the risks resulting from exposure to those hazards;

(c) provide and maintain at no cost to the worker suitable protective equipment, protective clothing and facilities, where adequate protection against risk of accident or injury to health, including exposure to adverse conditions, cannot be ensured by other means; and

(d) provide for appropriate transportation and access for injured workers to appropriate medical facilities.

14. The employer should ensure that:

(a) adequate training and retraining programmes and comprehensible safety instructions are provided for workers on safety and health matters as well as on the work assigned;

(b) adequate supervision and control on each shift are provided to secure the safe operation of the mine in accordance with national laws and regulations;

(c) a system is established so that the names of all persons who are underground can be accurately known at any time, as well as their probable location;

(d) all accidents and dangerous occurrences, as defined by national laws or regulations, are investigated in accordance with those laws and regulations, appropriate remedial action is taken and a report is made to the competent authorities; and

(e) measures and precautions appropriate to the nature of a mine operation are taken to prevent, detect and combat the start and spread of fires and explosions.

15. The employer should prepare an emergency response plan, specific to each mine, for reasonably foreseeable industrial and natural disasters.

16. On the basis of general principles of occupational health and in accordance with national laws and regulations, the employer should ensure the provision of regular health surveillance regarding the exposure of workers to occupational health hazards specific to mining.

17. (1) National laws and regulations pursuant to Point 9 should provide mine workers with the following rights:

(a) to report accidents and hazards to the employer and to the competent authority;

(b) to request and obtain inspections and investigations by the competent authority and the employer;

(c) to know and be informed of hazards that may effect their safety or health;

(d) to obtain information held by the employer or the competent authority which is relevant to their safety or health;

(e) to remove themselves from any location at the mine in the event that circumstances arise which appear, with reasonable justification, to pose a serious danger to their safety or health; and

(f) to collectively select safety and health representatives.

(2) The safety and health representatives referred to in paragraph (1)(f) above should have the following rights:

(a) to represent workers on all aspects of safety and health including the exercise of the rights in paragraph (1) above;

(b) to conduct inspections and investigations and participate in those conducted by the competent authority and the employer;

(c) to have recourse to advisers and independent experts;

(d) to consult in a timely fashion with the employer over safety and health matters, including policies and procedures;

(e) to consult with the competent authority; and

(f) to receive notice of accidents and dangerous occurrences, as defined by national laws or regulations.

(3) National laws and regulations pursuant to Point 9 should provide that the rights in paragraphs (1) and (2) be exercised without discrimination or retaliation.

(4) The procedures for the exercise of the rights in paragraphs (1) and (2) should be established by national laws and regulations and through consultations between employers, workers and their representatives.

18. National laws and regulations should provide that workers should have the duty, in accordance with their training, to:

(a) comply with prescribed safety and health measures;

(b) take reasonable care for their own safety and health and that of other persons who may be affected by their acts or omissions at work, including the proper use of facilities and equipment placed at their disposal for this purpose; and

(c) report forthwith to their immediate supervisor any situation which they believe could present a risk, and which they cannot properly deal with themselves.

19. Measures should be taken to encourage cooperation between employers and workers and their representatives, in accordance with national laws and regulations, to promote safety and health in mines.

III. Implementation

20. Each Member should:

(a) take all necessary measures, including the provision of appropriate penalties and corrective measures, to ensure the effective enforcement of the provisions of the Convention; and

(b) provide appropriate inspection services to supervise the application of the measures to be taken in pursuance of the Convention and provide these services with the resources necessary for the accomplishment of their task.

Proposed Conclusions with a view to a Recommendation

21. The provisions of the proposed Recommendation should be applied in conjunction with those of the proposed Convention.

I. Scope

22. The Recommendation should cover all mines.

23. The criteria referred in Point 7(b)(i) as a basis for exclusion of certain categories of mines could include:

(a) the nature of the problems which may justify such exclusion;

(b) the existence of alternative measures to ensure that the safety and health of workers are not compromised.

II. General provisions

24. (1) In the light of national conditions and practice and after consultation with the most representative organizations of employers and workers concerned, each Member should formulate, carry out and periodically review a coherent policy on safety and health in the mines.

(2) The consultations provided for by Point 8 should include consultations with the most representative organizations of employers and workers over the effect on workers' safety and health of the length of working hours, night work and shift work. After such consultations, each Member should take the necessary measures in relation to working time and, in particular, to maximum daily working hours and minimum daily rest periods.

25. (1) Cooperation between employers, workers and their representatives, referred to in Point 19, as well as consultation between them, should be organized to promote safety and health in mines.

(2) Measures to this effect should include:

(a) the establishment of safety and health committees, with equal representation of employers and workers having such powers and functions as may be prescribed, including powers for joint and regular inspections;

(b) the appointment by the employer of suitably qualified and experienced persons to promote safety and health;

(c) the training of workers and their safety and health representatives;

(d) the provision of safety and health awareness programmes for workers;

(e) the exchange of information and experience on safety and health in mines;

(f) the consultation of workers and their representatives by the employers in establishing safety and health policy and procedures; and

(g) the involvement of workers' representatives in the investigations provided for in Point 14(d).

26. All persons should have a duty to refrain from arbitrarily disconnecting, changing or removing safety devices fitted to machinery, equipment, appliances, tools, plant and buildings, and to use such safety devices correctly.

27. The competent authority should have properly qualified and trained staff with the appropriate skills, and sufficient technical and professional support, to inspect, investigate, assess and advise on the matters dealt with in the Convention and to ensure compliance with national laws and regulations.

28. Arrangements pursuant to Point 12 for coordination among several employers undertaking activities at the same mine should be such that:

(a) the employer who, in accordance with national laws and regulations, is in charge of the mine should be responsible for coordinating the implementation of all the measures concerning the safety and health of the workers;

(b) the coordination referred to in (a) above should not affect the responsibility of the individual employer for the safety and health of workers placed under his or her authority, or for any matter under the control of the employer.

III. Preventive and protective measures

29. Requirements relating to the supervision of safety and health in mines in pursuance of Point 10(b) could include:

(a) establishing certification and training requirements;

(b) inspecting the mine, mining equipment and installations on behalf of the employer;

(c) supervising the handling, transportation, storage and use of explosives;
(d) performing work on electrical equipment and installations;
(e) supervising workers.

30. In pursuance of Point 10(e) requirements could cover the obligations of the suppliers of mining equipment and appliances in regard to the safe labelling of products and clarity of instructions.

31. Requirements relating to mine rescue and first aid pursuant to Point 10(e)(i) could cover:

(a) organizational arrangements;
(b) equipment to be provided;
(c) the appropriate number of trained persons available;
(d) standards for training;
(e) training of workers and participation in drills;
(f) an appropriate communication system;
(g) a warning system to enable safe escape;
(h) provision and maintenance of means of escape and rescue;
(i) establishment of a mine rescue team, periodic medical assessment of suitability and regular training for the persons of the mine rescue team;
(j) transportation to receive medical attention for workers who have suffered an injury or illness, at the workplace, at no cost to the worker;
(k) measures to promote international cooperation in this field.

32. In pursuance of Point 10(e)(ii) requirements could cover the specifications of the type of self-rescuers to be provided, and in particular, in the case of mines susceptible to gas outbursts, the provision of self-contained respiratory devices.

33. In order to maintain the stability of the ground in accordance with Point 11(c), the employer should take measures to:

(a) monitor and control the movement of strata;
(b) as may be necessary, provide effective support of the roof, sides and floor of the mine workings, except for those areas where mining methods are undertaken that involve the controlled collapse of the ground;
(c) monitor and control the sides of surface mines to prevent material from falling or sliding into the pit, thereby endangering workers; and
(d) ensure that dams, lagoons, tailings and other such impoundments are adequately designed and controlled to prevent dangers from sliding material or collapse.

34. Pursuant to Point 11(d), where appropriate, mine facilities should include sufficient fire-proof and self-contained chambers to provide refuge for workers in the event of an emergency.

35. Pursuant to Point 11(f), all underground mine workings to which workers have access, and other areas as necessary, should be ventilated in an appropriate manner to ensure:

(a) that the atmosphere complies with national standards on dusts, gases and climatic conditions;

(b) an atmosphere in which the risk of explosions is kept under control;

(c) an atmosphere in which working conditions are adequate while work is in progress, having regard to the working method being used and the physical demands placed on the workers.

36. The particular hazards referred to in Point 11(g) which require an operating plan might include:

(a) underground mine fires;

(b) gas outbursts;

(c) rockbursts;

(d) an inrush of water or semi-solids;

(e) rockfalls;

(f) susceptibility of areas to seismic movements;

(g) those related to work carried out near dangerous openings or under extremely difficult geological circumstances.

37. The hazards referred to in Point 13 might include:

(a) airborne dusts;

(b) flammable, toxic, noxious and other mine gases;

(c) noxious and toxic gases and fumes and hazardous chemicals;

(d) radiation from rock strata, equipment or other sources;

(e) noise and vibration;

(f) extreme temperatures;

(g) insufficient lighting or ventilation;

(h) those hazards related to work carried out at high altitudes or extreme depths;

(i) hazards associated with manual handling;

(j) high levels of humidity;

(k) exhaust fumes from diesel equipment;

(l) oxygen deficiency;

(m) hazards resulting from a combination of the above.

38. The measures referred to in Point 13 might comprise:

(a) technical and organizational measures applied to relevant mining activities, or to the plant, machinery, equipment, appliances or structures;

(b) where it is not possible to have recourse to the measures referred to in (a) above, other effective measures, including the use of personal protective equipment and protective clothing at no cost to the worker;

(c) where reproductive health hazards and risks have been identified, special organizational, training and technical measures, including the right to alternative work, where appropriate, without any loss of salary, especially during health risk periods such as pregnancy and breast-feeding;

(d) regular monitoring and inspection of areas where hazards are present or likely to be present.

39. In implementing Point 14(b), employers should:

(a) ensure pre-shift inspections of each workplace and of the machinery, equipment and appliances therein; and

(b) keep written records of pre-shift inspections, defects and corrective measures and make such records available at the mine.

40. Measures that employers could take to implement Point 14(e) should include, where applicable, prohibiting persons from carrying underground any item, object or substance which could initiate a fire, explosion or dangerous occurrence.

41. The emergency response plan referred to in Point 15 might include:

(a) effective site emergency plans;

(b) provision for the cessation of work and evacuation of the workforce in the event of an emergency;

(c) adequate training in emergency procedures and in the use of equipment;

(d) adequate protection of the public and the environment;

(e) provision of information to, and consultation with, appropriate bodies and organizations.

42. Where appropriate, the programme of health surveillance contained in Point 16 should, at no cost to the worker and without any discrimination or retaliation:

(a) provide the opportunity to undergo medical examination prior to or just after commencing work and thereafter on a continuing basis; and

(b) provide, where possible, for reintegration or rehabilitation of workers unable to undertake their normal duties due to occupational injury or illness.

43. Pursuant to Point 17(1)(e), procedures could include requirements for:

(a) notification of supervisors and safety and health representatives of the danger;

(b) participation by senior representatives of the employer and representatives of the workers in endeavouring to resolve the issue;

(c) participation, where necessary, by a representative of the competent authority to assist in resolution of the issue;

(d) no loss of pay for the worker and, where appropriate, assignment to suitable alternative work;

(e) notification of any worker who is requested to perform work in the area concerned of the danger and of the fact that a worker has refused to work in the area.

44. Pursuant to Point 17, paragraph (2), the rights afforded to safety and health representatives should include, where appropriate:

(a) the right to appropriate training during working time, without loss of pay, on their rights and functions as a safety and health representative and on safety and health matters;

(b) the right of access to appropriate facilities necessary to perform their functions;

(c) the right to receive their normal pay for all time spent exercising their rights and performing their functions as safety and health representatives; and

(d) the right to assist and advise a worker who has withdrawn from a workplace because he or she believes his or her health or safety is endangered.

45. Pursuant to Point 17, the information that workers and their representatives should receive should include, where appropriate:

(a) reports of inspections conducted by the competent authority or the employer, including inspections of machinery or equipment;

(b) copies of orders or instructions issued by the competent authority in respect of safety and health matters;

(c) reports of accidents, injuries, instances of ill health and other occurrences affecting safety and health prepared by the competent authority or the employer;

(d) information and notices on all hazards at work including hazardous, toxic or harmful materials, agents or substances used at the mine;

(e) any other documentation concerning safety and health that the employer is required to maintain;

(f) immediate notification of accidents and other dangerous occurrences;

(g) where practicable, notice of any visit to the mine by the competent authority; and

(h) any health studies conducted in respect of hazards present in the workplace.

46. Measures should be taken to encourage and promote:

(a) research into and exchange of information on safety and health in mines at the national and international level; and

(b) specific assistance to small mines with a view to assisting in transfer of technical know-how, establishing preventive safety and health programmes and encouraging cooperation and consultation with workers and their representatives.

47. Where appropriate, employers should provide and maintain:

(a) sufficient and suitable toilets, showers, wash-basins and changing facilities which are, where appropriate, gender-specific;

(b) adequate facilities for the storage, laundering and drying of clothes;

(c) adequate supplies of potable drinking-water in suitable places; and

(d) adequate and hygienic accommodation for taking meals.

48. An employer should not discriminate or retaliate against any worker who exercises rights provided by national laws and regulations or by the competent authority, or agreed upon by the employer and the representatives of the workers.

49. Due regard should be given to the possible impact of mining activity on the surrounding environment and on the safety of the public. In particular this should include the control of subsidence, vibration, harmful contaminants in the water, air or soil and the safe and effective management of waste tips and rehabilitation of mine sites.

Resolution to place on the agenda of the next ordinary session of the Conference an item entitled: Safety and health in mines

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

Having adopted the report of the Committee appointed to consider the fifth item on the agenda,

Having in particular approved as general conclusions, with a view to the consultation of Governments, proposals for a Convention and a Recommendation concerning safety and health in mines;

Decides that an item entitled "Safety and health in mines" shall be included in the agenda of its next ordinary session for second discussion with a view to the adoption of a Convention and a Recommendation.

THIRD AND FOURTH REPORTS OF THE CREDENTIALS COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION AND NOTING

The PRESIDENT – The first item on our agenda this morning is the consideration of the third and fourth reports of the Credentials Committee which you will find in Provisional Record Nos. 18 and 20.

I would like to invite the Officers of the Committee to come to the rostrum: the Chairman, Mr. Spencer, Government delegate, Trinidad and Tobago; the Employer Vice-Chairman, Mr. Funes de Rioja, Employers' adviser, Argentina; and the Worker Vice-Chairman, Mr. Trotman, Workers' delegate, Barbados.

Before giving the floor to Mr. Spencer, I would like to make an announcement concerning a letter received from the Government of Malaysia containing an objection to the third report of the Credentials Committee. The letter is signed by Mr. Dato' Anthony Yeo, Government delegate of Malaysia, and concerns the nomination of the Workers' delegate of Malaysia.

I have transmitted the letter to the Chairman of the Credentials Committee; since it is rather detailed and I do not wish to prolong the proceedings of the Conference with a matter that does not call for a discussion, I will ask the Clerk of the Conference to give a summary of its contents. I understand that the full text of the letter will be available for inspection in the Credentials Committee secretariat, should any of you wish to see it.

The CLERK OF THE CONFERENCE – In the letter, the Government of Malaysia contests the Credentials Committee's conclusion that the Government had imposed a system of rotation for the nomination of the Workers' delegate. It states that genuine consultations had been carried out with the labour centres in Malaysia and the Government's decision was supported by two of them. In the Government's view, the Credentials Committee did not appear to have taken sufficient account of the precedent in 1992, when the objection by the same organization was not upheld.

The Government also considers that the Committee did not take account of the fact that the president of the objecting organization had been requested to collect the travel and subsistence payments from the relevant ministry and of the fact that, prior to the dispatch of the credentials to the ILO, the objecting organization had not declined to act as advisers and had not attached any conditionalities to the nomination.

The letter expresses concern that the names of the advisers had been removed from the list of delegates to the Conference without the Government's consent.

Finally, the Government considers that one member of the Committee should have abstained from the deliberations as he is president of an organization which was also a party to the objection.

The PRESIDENT – I now give the floor to Mr. Spencer to present the third and fourth reports of the Credentials Committee.

Mr. SPENCER (Government delegate, Trinidad and Tobago; Chairman of the Credentials Committee) – I am pleased to present the third and fourth reports of the Credentials Committee which contain the Committee's conclusions on the remaining eight objections lodged with it. Seven were against the nomination of Workers' delegates or advisers; one was against an Employers' delegation.

In order to save time, I shall only refer to the main points dealt with. One question considered in relation to some of the objections was the adequacy of consultations carried out in the most representative workers' organizations in order to obtain their agreement on the composition of the delegation.

A precondition for this exercise is a reliable assessment of which organizations in the country are the most representative. As it had done in the previous report, the Committee stressed the need for governments to obtain the necessary data. One means of obtaining the agreement of the most representative organizations is a system of rotation. But, as previous Credentials Committees have stressed, rotation is acceptable only if all the most representative organizations agree.

A question came up in a number of cases this year, but in two cases in particular. In one of them, while the Committee decided not to impose invalidation, it expressed serious doubts as to the validity of the nomination of the Workers' delegate. I should correct my statement – did not propose invalidation. The Committee is not able to impose invalidation. The objecting organization not only appeared to be the most representative, and the organization to which the delegate belonged, but had obviously been recognized as most representative in previous years.

The other main case involving rotation is that of Malaysia. According to figures provided by the Government, the objecting organization was more representative than the other two central workers' organizations put together. However, since 1982 the right to choose the Workers' delegate had been given alternately to the objecting organization and the second largest central organization. This year, it was the latter's turn.

The Committee can find no evidence that the objecting organization had ever agreed to the rotation scheme, but it appeared to have acquiesced in the practice up to the 1992 Session of the Conference. This year, its position was made clear beyond any possible doubt.

The Government, having tried to obtain agreement among the central organizations, continued to apply the rotation system however. While the Committee did not wish to recommend invalidation of the credentials, it stressed the need for the Government in future to adopt other means of ensuring that the Workers' delegate is chosen in agreement with the most representative organizations.

After learning of the Government's nomination of the delegate from the less representative organization, three of the objecting organization's representatives, who had been nominated by the Government as advisers, notified the Government and the ILO that they declined to act in that capacity. Considering that they had been validly appointed, the Government nevertheless maintained them on the list.

This raised another question as, under the Standing Orders, advisers cannot object to the credentials of their own delegate. Since, however, they had clearly declined to act as advisers, the Committee concluded that they could not be considered as such. It therefore found the objection to be receivable and decided that the two signatories of the objection, and a third member of the objecting organization, should not appear as advisers in the list of delegations.

For cases like this, where, among the most representative organizations there is one which is significantly larger than the others, the Committee stressed the importance of the obligation on the Government to try to obtain an agreement through bona fide discussions with all the organizations.

This recommendation is particularly relevant to another case in which the most representative workers' organization refused to agree to the participation in the delegation of any member of the objecting organization which, although much smaller than the other, was the second largest in the country.

Another objection concerned a situation where the required consultations were not carried out by the Government directly, but rather by a national consultative body consisting of workers' confederations, centres and non-affiliated federations. This consultative body has been established by law to recommend to the Government the names of three persons to represent the workers of the country at the International Labour Conference and in other forums.

The objecting organization, which appeared to be the most representative workers' organization in the country, complained that it had not been invited to the meeting in which the selection of this session of the Conference had been made. In this case, the Committee considered that a government cannot simply leave matters in the hands of a national institution, even one that is acting in accordance with national law. The Committee felt that the government must always make sure that the procedure followed also respected the country's international obligations, particularly the requirement under article 5, paragraph 4, of the ILO Constitution to secure the greatest possible agreement among the most representative workers' organizations. The procedure had obviously failed to do so in the present case.

Finally, two objections concern cases where the question of which organization was the most representative in the countries concerned was not an issue. The allegation was that the organization consulted was not representative at all, in view of the alleged government interference and denial of freedom of association. Although the Committee commented on one of the cases in connection with the nomination procedure, the Committee felt that they essentially fell outside its terms of reference.

In addition to objections, the Committee's fourth report summarizes a communication that it received from the Employers' group protesting at the number of governments that had not respected the obligation to bear travel and subsistence expenses of their Employers' delegations. The group also expressed dissatisfaction with the continuing imbalance between Governments and Employers and Workers' advisers which it said was mainly detrimental to the Employers. The communication emphasized the increasing dimension of the problem. In this connection, the Committee's report notes that it is not yet possible to assess the extent of the problem as only a third of the member States have provided the information requested by the Office on this question.

I should now like to thank the Conference for having appointed me to the Credentials Committee. Many delegates, particularly the President must be very familiar with this Committee, but for me it was a new experience. When I accepted the position, I had not realized that I would be thrust into so many questions that are at the heart of tripartism. And here I must pay due credit and express my sincere appreciation to the other two members of the Credentials Committee, Mr. Daniel Funes de Rioja, the Employer member, and Mr. Leroy Trotman, the Worker member, for their tremendous contribution to the work of the Committee. Their patience and thoroughness ensured that each matter which was brought for our consideration received a fair, balanced and constructive review. They both join me in extending our special thanks to the members of the secretariat who assisted the work of the Committee. Without their keen professionalism, dedication and instinctive regard for social justice, this Committee would not have been able to navigate the plethora of pitfalls and obfuscations and continue its search for answers which in many cases have long been established in case law. We thank them most sincerely.

We also thank the many interpreters who so competently bridged the gap across the languages.

The PRESIDENT – Since the third and fourth reports of the Credentials Committee were adopted unanimously by the Committee, the Conference is merely called upon to take note of the reports.

(The reports are noted.)

The PRESIDENT – I would like to thank the Chairman, the Vice-Chairmen and the other members of the Committee and the s ecretariat for the excellent work they have done. Having had the opportunity to serve on the Credentials Committee for several years, I know what a difficult and delicate task it can be.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON PRIVATE EMPLOYMENT AGENCIES: SUBMISSION, DISCUSSION AND ADOPTION

The PRESIDENT – The second item on our agenda is the consideration and adoption of the report of the Committee on Private Employment Agencies, which you will find in Provisional Record No. 21. I have pleasure in asking Mrs. Okoronkwo, Government delegate, Nigeria, Chairperson of the Committee; Mr. Hultin, Employers' delegate, Finland, Employer Vice-Chairman; Mr. Lynch, Workers' adviser, United States, Worker Vice-Chairman; and Mr. Kruse, Government adviser, Sweden, Reporter of the Committee, to come to the rostrum.

Mr. KRUSE (Government adviser, Sweden; Reporter of the Committee on Private Employment Agencies) – As Reporter of the Committee on Private Employment Agencies, I have the honour to present the Committee's report to this session of the Conference. You will find the report in Provisional Record No. 21.

The report was adopted by the Committee during its twelfth and final sitting on Monday, 20 June 1994. It reflects the discussions held in the Committee and the Committee's conclusions on the subject. The conclusions had been worked out by a tripartite Working Party after a general discussion of the issues in the Committee, and I am very happy to be able to say that the conclusions were adopted by the Committee by consensus without any amendments.

The Committee had before it ILO Report VI entitled The role of private employment agencies in the functioning of labour markets. That report is an excellent piece of work, the fruit of many months of research, discussion, study and assessment of all the issues, and many have stated before the Committee that this report is one of the best ever drawn up in the ILO. It takes a fresh view of the ILO Fee-Charging Employment Agencies (Revised) Convention, 1949 (No. 96), contains stimulating discussions on the issues concerned and introduces valuable topics for further discussions, all of this based on hard facts and good research. The report laid solid ground for a very fruitful deliberation in the Committee and in the Working Party.

During the general discussion in the Committee, we supplemented the report through a large number of interventions from Employers, Workers and Governments. A most varied and colourful picture of the role and performances of private and public employment agencies all over the world emerged. We listened to reports about the value that private agencies add to the functioning of labour markets in many countries. We learned that the biggest employer in the United States, with 600,000 employees, is a temporary works agency. But we also listened to reports about abuses and about private agencies' exploitation of workers, such as when poor workers in developing countries have to sell their last valuable asset, namely the family's water-buffalo, in order to get or keep an underpaid job.

So, as you will understand, we have discussed matters of great importance and of great complexity, where workers' fundamental rights and people's jobs and lives are at stake.

Out of the discussions, some fundamental agreements emerged very quickly.

First, any new standards in this field should reaffirm one of the most important tenets of the Declaration of Philadelphia, namely that "labour is not a commodity".

Secondly, the underlying idea of Convention No. 96, that employment services should be a state monopoly and that private agencies should be banned, is outdated.

Thirdly, private employment agencies, in all their different shapes, should be accepted as actors and partners in the labour market.

Fourthly, Convention No. 96 should be revised and new ILO standards developed; these new standards should acknowledge that situations differ between regions and between markets and should therefore be very flexible and allow for different national regulations.

Lastly, new standards should also aim at protecting workers' rights and promote good industrial relations. Jobseekers should not have to pay for finding a job.

The Committee has summarized its findings in the conclusions of its report. There, the Committee: defines a well-functioning labour market; discusses the labour market policies and the actors in the labour market; describes the role of public employment services and the role and practices of private employment agencies; discusses the objective and scope of regulations in the field as well as other means for sound practices; calls for better and increased cooperation between public and private employment agencies; and, finally, outlines the prospects for future ILO standards.

The Committee has worked very hard and I firmly believe that it has achieved what it set out to do. The easiest way to describe the work of the Committee is "tripartism in action". Throughout the work, there have been true negotiations between active, powerful and determined parties, that is Workers, Employers and Governments. And I am most pleased to underline that we all came to a consensus about the report and conclusions without any amendments or voting, which shows the strength of tripartism at its best. I am convinced that the report and conclusions which we submit to the Conference today will be a most valuable document for the future work of the ILO in this field and provide a solid ground for a total revision of Convention No. 96.

I could very well stop here, but I want to make some more general remarks from my experiences of the work in our Committee.

We have heard critical comments from this rostrum during the last weeks about the ILO and its standards. Some seem to think that the ILO and its standards are too sophisticated and out of touch with the realities of the world outside these buildings.

Some of this may be true. But the work of our Committee has convinced me that there is good hope for the ILO. It has shown that the ILO is very open to change and that its Members are able to give up old outdated principles in favour of new flexible standards when realities call for it. And it has shown that the keys to change are solid facts, good research and hard tripartite work. For that we need qualified expertise and active, powerful and determined Employers, Workers and Governments working together. The future for the ILO is certainly critical and great changes have to be made in leadership, in methods of work, in the setting of standards and in procedures if the ILO is to prosper for another 75 years. I honestly believe that the work in our Committee and the results that we have produced can stand as symbols for the good tripartite efforts that are needed for the future. And I truly hope that a revised Convention No. 96 will also be a symbol for the new kind of worldwide labour standards which so many speakers before me have called for.

Our Committee would not have been able to produce such good results if we had not had that strong leadership and those good tripartite methods of work performed by our Chairperson Mrs. Okoronkwo, the two Vice-Chairpersons, Mr. Hultin for the Employers and Mr. Lynch for the Workers, and the spokespersons for the Governments, Ms. Nixon and Mr. Pratt. And, of course, all of us should have been helpless had we not had the strong support and help and the cheer and bright smiles from the hard working, skilful and wise members of the secretariat. I want to thank all of them for their dedicated work. It has been an honour and a pleasure for me to work for this Committee and I am happy and proud to present the results of its work to the Conference.

The PRESIDENT – The discussion of the report is now open.

Mr. HULTIN (Employers' delegate, Finland; Employer Vice-Chairman of the Committee on Private Employment Agencies) – In summing up the point of view of the Employers' group concerning the work of the Committee on the role of private employment agencies in the functioning of labour markets, I would like to concentrate on three main points, namely the development of private employment agencies, the coexistence of private and public agencies and, lastly, the rules that govern private agencies' activities.

First let me say a few words about the development of private employment agencies. The wide range of agencies and services that exist on the market are descriptive of the complexity of the market and its various needs, as well as the changes in our respective societies and the attitudes of individuals. It also reflects the continuously dynamic nature of the market and the ability of private agencies to meet changing requirements and to innovate new services to meet the current and future needs of their clients. There is ample evidence of private agencies' growth in the literature reviewed and, of course in the report that was prepared for the Committee's discussion. Also, the examples given by many delegates during the discussion indicate that private agencies' activities have grown strongly in their respective countries. It should be recognized that the reason for this growth is based on private agencies' ability to respond quickly to the needs in the market.

The experience that proves the positive contribution of these agencies cannot be discounted any longer. Their existence contributes to the functioning of the labour markets and to employment by providing an additional mechanism to meet the needs for both employers and employees. They are additional channels, and therefore they add to the accessibility of services and information.

We should also not forget the social contribution made by private agencies to the people who, through them, have found a way to an active working life. Sometimes this takes the form of finding a permanent job, either through placement or through a temporary job as a stepping stone, but we should also remember those people who, for personal reasons, prefer a flexible work arrangement over a regular job.

At this point I would briefly like to recognize the activities of public employment agencies as well. The activities they perform include, of course, the administration of jobs. But we should also remember that the public employment agency is instrumental in the implementation of national employment programmes. They organize training courses for the unemployed with a view to facilitating their entry or re-entry into working life. Both employers and employees can concretely benefit from these programmes when they are specifically adapted to a particular type of employment, sometimes in connection with apprenticeship programmes for young unemployed people.

Experience has shown that for the better part of their activities, public and private agencies cover different needs and therefore have specific roles in the labour markets. Because of this, their coexistence is not only possible, but even constructive and desirable. Competition makes for efficiency and continually improves services. Where private agencies benefit from competition, public agencies too could find an opportunity to improve their own operations. Because their coexistence is based on their complementarity or on competitivity, the Employers' group feels strongly that equality between public and private agencies is important. To ensure efficient activity, private agencies cannot be subordinated to public agencies.

This leads me to my third and last point, the rules that govern private agencies. Employer work to improve the functioning of labour markets with a view to promoting freely chosen and productive employment. We do not welcome underground activity or unfair practices. Practice has shown us that monopolies or the non-acceptance of agencies can lead to a shadow economy with a resulting lack of transparency on that part of the labour market. Regulators have not been able to outsmart the markets. If the need exists for such activities they do not simply vanish because regulators call for their elimination.

The growth of private employment agencies, the low number of ratifications of Convention No. 96 and recent denunciations of the Convention demonstrate that the principle of monopoly has been surpassed by reality. Also, excessive regulation hampers normal development and is an obstacle to the improvement of services. In its own way, it encourages mass activity to the detriment of transparency. Private employment agencies need to and wish to operate within a framework of established rules. These are available at the national level in the form of national regulations or industry codes that are established either through competition or self-regulation. There is also consultation, negotiation and collective bargaining. The effective application of these vary from country to country, depending on their specific cultures, habits and established procedures. It is therefore, we feel, very important that the actors at the national level be given sufficient flexibility to determine the framework of rules that is best suited for their situations. Therefore, national and international rules need to ensure firstly, protection against misconduct; secondly, strengthening of the machinery available to job-seekers and employers to obtain employment and to fill vacancies; thirdly, to fully utilize the unused and used potential of private agencies; fourthly, to support the future healthy developments of the labour market; and lastly, to secure that a mechanism is in place to meet continually changing market needs.

It is against this background that we, the employers, are happy with the conclusions of the Committee, that is to revise Convention No. 96 with the objective of enabling it to respond to the dynamics of changing labour markets, to describe public and private agencies to help ensure a well-functioning labour market, to establish principles and guidelines to protect against unethical practices, and to improve workers and employers relationships in different types of private employment agencies, to improve the functioning of all employment agencies, and last, but not least, to allow national governments to determine how these objectives will be met.

The employers are, therefore, most pleased to recommend the adoption of the report and the conclusions.

Having said that, I would also like to say some words about the process. Of course I join in with all the compliments and the words of gratitude that have been addressed, and I am sure will be addressed, to the participants of the Committee. The report that was prepared by Mr. Ricca and his staff provided an excellent point of departure for the Committee's work. Mr. Simpson's secretariat worked under high pressure and, apart from delivering work of a high quality, were still able to wear a smile which inspired all of us on the Committee to continue our task.

But the real tribute that I would like to pay now is to the dialogue and cooperation that built up during these two weeks between the three parties. This was tripartism at its best. Our work got off to a slow start, but we managed, with considerable help from our Government colleagues in the working party, to dig ourselves out of our ditches. We managed, in an unprejudiced way, to listen to and to consider each other's views and concerns. In the process, to quote our Reporter's words during the work, we had to kill some of our darlings, but I also find that, in the same process, others may have fallen in love with somebody else's darlings! It was this showcase of tripartism that led to the Committee's conclusion to revise and modernize an ILO instrument, to correspond to the realities and the current needs of our labour markets. It is after this encouraging experience that I am reassured that, by working for a common goal and considering each other's concerns with open minds, we really can create a more relevant ILO for our future labour markets.

Mr. LYNCH (Workers' adviser, United States; Worker Vice-Chairman of the Committee on Private Employment Agencies) – I am pleased to recommend adoption of the report and conclusions of our discussion by this session of the Conference. I also want to urge the Governing Body to act upon the recommendation our Committee has made.

The decision by the Governing Body to include a discussion on the role of private employment agencies in the functioning of labour markets was wise and especially fitting for this the 75th anniversary of the ILO and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia. This seemingly technical subject touches the heart of the employment relationship which has been redefined in ways that place workers and the stability of society in jeopardy. Many activities of private employment agencies, especially those of temporary work agencies, staff-leasing agencies and contract labour agencies create a triangular relationship that can redefine the meaning of employer as well.

This discussion is held at a time when governments are becoming more fully aware of the world unemployment crisis. Our recommendations bring to an end an impasse that has prevented ILO activity in an area of increasing importance to workers, employers as well as governments in developed and developing countries and in transitional economies.

We have recommended that Fee-Charging Employment Agencies Convention (Revised), 1949 (No.96) be revised again. But our call for a revised standard also has an important message for those who question standard setting as the basic mission of the ILO, for those who claim that many standards need to be revised, and for those who do not see the importance of new standards.

Convention No. 96 is not a recent standard. Since its adoption 45 years ago much has changed. We have seen the emergence of new kinds of private employment agencies and new roles for private employment agencies in labour markets. These changes, which have been well documented in the detailed report prepared by the Office, have affected both jobseekers and those with jobs. These effects have not all been positive. Many have been negative and some even dangerous.

The Worker members of this Committee provided testimony as to how private employment agencies sometimes increase precarious employment at the expense of stable employment and of a stable system of industrial relations. Our testimony showed how some private employment agencies were used to frustrate the legitimate role of governments by circumventing laws against discrimination in employment or the obligation of employers to provide such social protections as industrial accident insurance. We noted the difference between those private employment agencies that place workers and those that replace workers. We further pointed out the need for transparency in the labour market. Private cannot mean secret. We also reminded the Committee of the terrible record of abuse by some agencies that recruit workers in one country for employment in another country. The Worker members made a strong case for a new standard to protect both jobseekers and workers – that case is clearly reflected in the recommendations of this Committee as to what should be included in any revision of Convention No. 96.

The Committee discussed other standards, notably the Employment Service Convention, 1948 (No. 88) and the Employment Service Recommendation, 1948 (No. 83) and we do not advocate the revision of these standards. The Committee recognized the central role of governments in the functioning of labour markets and the essential role of the public employment service. This included the need to provide services to all jobseekers.

We noted that no revision of Convention No. 96 should prevent governments from choosing to exercise a monopoly over those functions they considered appropriate or necessary to fulfil their responsibilities. We were reminded that in some countries Convention No. 96 is part of the foundation of good labour market relations and of the overall social system.

Private employment agencies may never become major actors in all labour markets. However, governments, employers, jobseekers and workers must be. So, we discussed how in some countries the labour market is well regulated by a tripartite labour administration and we talked about how trade unions might choose to provide many of the services provided by private employment agencies.

That same period that has seen the growth of private employment agencies has also seen the growth of public expectations that hold governments accountable for employment including more active intervention in the labour market. So what then is our Committee really saying about ILO standards? I believe that one message is for standard setting to remain the basic mission of the ILO. The Employers also sought a new standard. Another message is that the purpose of standards must be to provide protection to workers, in other words the decision to revise standards must be based on the need to provide workers with additional protection. Another message is that, in the complex world of work, new standards will be necessary.

There is no message from this Committee that says that change alone can justify the revision of standards. We reject the slogans of the 1980s that treated the market as a religion or as an uncontrollable force to be obeyed. We will never surrender the control of our destiny embodied in human rights and democratic values and manifested in laws and standards.

Not all changes have to be accepted as inevitable or good. Today the increasing attacks on freedom of association make Convention No. 87 more, not less, important. The same may be said about many other Conventions.

Finally, I express my appreciation to Mr. Hultin and the other Employer members, as well as to Ms. Nixon and the other Government members for keeping the spirit of tripartism alive in the Committee. It is a birthday present to the ILO. I also express the appreciation and gratitude of the Workers for the excellent work of the Office, to our outstanding Chairperson, Ms. Okoronkwo, and our effective Reporter, Mr. Kruse.

Ms. OKORONKWO (Government delegate, Nigeria; Chairperson of the Committee on Private Employment Agencies) – Let me on behalf of my Government, the Federal Republic of Nigeria, thank this august Conference for the honour and the unique opportunity given to me to serve as the Chairman of this important Committee. I would like to pay special tribute to the members of the Committee, the Governments, Employers and Workers, who displayed a true spirit of tripartism throughout the deliberations of the well-researched document on the role of private employment agencies in the functioning of labour markets. Though participants expressed various views on the subject-matter, nevertheless, there was always a consensus and a spirit of give and take without necessarily anyone's compromising his principles. The leadership qualities of the two Vice-Chairmen were contributory to this achievement.

The positive role of private employment agencies in the labour market can never be overemphasized. The Committee acknowledged that, in the rapidly changing world, private employment agencies had increased spectacularly in size and importance in some countries. They had also acquired growing recognition as important elements in the labour markets. The Committee concluded that well-functioning private employment agencies most certainly could contribute to the effective functioning of the labour market. However, the Committee expressed its continuing support for the principles set out in the Employment Services Convention, 1948 (No. 88), particularly the duty of the employment services to ensure the best possible organization of the labour market. The Committee tried successfully to come up with constructive conclusions and suggestions which would form the basis for future ILO standards on the public employment services as well as private employment agencies.

Before I conclude my short remarks, I wish to express my profound appreciation to the representative of the Secretary-General for his continuous assistance to the Committee in providing all the relevant information. My gratitude goes to the secretariat staff, the technocrats who carried out the survey and the invisible translators, without whom the Committee's work would have come to nought. My gratitude goes to the members of the Working Party and the Reporter for preparing the drafts.

In conclusion I wish to thank the Conference for giving the members of the Committee the opportunity to discuss this issue. The report before you for adoption was carefully prepared by men and women of integrity and experience. I commend this report to the Conference, for unanimous adoption.

Mr. D'SOUZA (Minister of Labour, Government of the State of Karnataka, India) – All the countries of the world, irrespective of their stages of development, strive for economic growth. This growth is not an end in itself. It is only a means to the end of securing equitable human welfare. Jobless growth has only too often distorted equity and social justice everywhere in the world. It is against this background that the whole question of employment and labour market institutions should be considered.

Labour is indeed a factor of production. There will, therefore, always be supply and demand factors to influence its price. But it has a human dimension unlike other factors of production. That is why the Declaration of Philadelphia spells out as the first fundamental principle of the ILO that "labour is not a commodity".

In all countries there are always people in search of jobs and employers capable of providing job opportunities. Matching the jobseeker with the right job is a very vital task that needs to be performed, whether that function is performed by public or private employment agencies.

The labour market is often stratified. There are different strata of this market consisting of different categories of jobs – casual, temporary, regular, permanent and so on. The interlinkages between these various categories are also quite dynamic because workers strive to move into higher and more advantageous categories of jobs. The complexity of the labour market makes the function of the employment agencies rather technical too.

While the public employment agencies do perform a very useful role, there are natural limitations on their capabilities. Generally, as a matter of policy, this is at least true of my country. Public employment exchanges only refer candidates to employers in response to their vacancy notifications. The employers do not have a legal obligation to give jobs to persons so notified. This is so because public agencies cannot and should not compel employers to give placements to jobseekers. Apart from this, the outreach of these agencies in practice is very much less than of private employment agencies.

The process of liberalization of economies, deregulation, decontrol and structural adjustment, apart from emigration overseas for employment, have tended to make jobseekers increasingly look to private employment agencies for their help. The reason is that they are able to respond more quickly to the fast-changing requirements of the labour market. So they deserve to be encouraged.

It is also a fact that there has been a mushrooming of private employment agencies with tendencies to have recourse to unethical practices. Very often jobseekers get exploited and there is a strong case for supervision of these agencies. In India, we try to regulate private agencies operating to facilitate placements in foreign job markets. Our instrumentality is the Emigration Act. We do have problems sometimes in using this instrument. There is need for a delicate balance to be struck between regulation and laisser faire, depending on specific country situations. It is gratifying to note against this background that the Committee on Private Employment Agencies has taken note of the incongruity of The Fee-Charging Employment Agencies Convention (Revised), 1949 (No. 96) in the fast-changing world in the context of several countries, of the complementarity of public and private employment agencies, of the need to protect jobseekers, and of the recognition of the need for appropriate national action to give such protection.

There is, however, a matter which I place before you for consideration. Independent national action alone will not be adequate for protecting jobseekers in the case of emigration for employment. Host country governments also have a vital role to play to ensure that immigrant jobseekers are protected. This could best be achieved by bilateral national actions and I feel that this aspect has not come out explicitly in the Committee's report. The host countries are also essential actors in the labour market. In ILO parlance, we are agreed on promoting "full, freely chosen and productive employment". I would urge that, at least in future deliberations, ILO bodies should add to these characteristics of employment a neglected dimension: the dimension of humanization, so that our slogan should be "full, freely chosen, productive and humanized employment".

I conclude by expressing the support of my delegation for the report before us.

Mr. PETERSON (Government adviser, United States) – The 75th anniversary of the ILO's founding and the 50th year since the Declaration of Philadelphia bring us together in a spirit of celebration. But today I speak out of a spirit of concern, combined with hope that the enduring principles and freedoms envisaged in an earlier era can be given renewal and permanency in our lives and institutions today.

To recall 1919 and 1944 is to reflect on a world at war and the attendant tragedy and personal sacrifices of millions of human beings. Yet, remarkably, from such conditions came the ILO, the bright hope of Philadelphia, and the principles which, according to the Declaration, "should inspire the policies of its members". Let us never forget the price paid and the lessons taught by those trying times.

The ILO has placed employment creation at the top of its concerns since the outset, and today jobs and gainful employment seem more urgent than ever before. In joining material and spiritual well-being, there is recognition in the Declaration of a basic truth. Indeed, the need to re-enthrone work in the lives of individuals is greater today than ever before, and the need to recognize the spiritual side of mankind is perhaps the most important and fundamental need of all.

The work ethic embraced by those who built and sustained the United States and other nations is giving way at an alarming rate to an "entitlement" mentality. This is in part the reason we are embarking on a plan in our country to "end welfare as we know it" – a plan which will rely primarily for its financing of training and job preparation on US$7.1 billion in proposed savings from existing entitlement programmes. We aim to transform our unemployment system into a re-employment system with emphasis on both job search assistance and long-term training for tomorrow's jobs.

Work is a foundation for freedom as it fosters self-reliance and enables men and women "to act for themselves and not to be acted upon" (to quote a wise observer). Work is the solution to many kinds of problems. It is the key to providing food, clothing and shelter. It contributes substantially to social, emotional and spiritual well-being. It is critical to life and liberty – and the pursuit of happiness in its many forms. With his usual precision, United States Ambassador J. Reuben Clark once observed: "There is no curse equal to the curse of idleness. It destroys the man, the group, the people, or the nation who suffer under it." Unemployment is a scourge of our time.

The sixth agenda item at this session of the Conference – the general discussion of the role of private employment agencies in the functioning of labour markets – has been an intelligent and constructive step forward. The Committee has set an important pattern for future tripartite cooperation in the revision of international labour standards which have been overtaken by global developments and the play of free markets. We support the adoption of the report before the Conference. Even so, we have expressed concern for an ILO model of shared labour market management which posits government "control over information" combined with the power to "compel institutions, enterprises, firms or persons possessing information considered important to make it accessible". We must never forget the origins of tyranny in the control of ideas – that the wellsprings of democracy are found in freedom of expression and the choices of a free people acting without compulsion.

Most of us have had the experience either as parents or youngsters of trying to discover the hidden picture within another picture in a children's magazine. Usually, you are shown a landscape with trees, bushes, flowers and other bits of nature. The caption reads something like this: "Concealed somewhere in this picture is a donkey pulling a car with a boy in it. Can you find them?" Try as you might, usually you cannot find the hidden picture until you turn to a page further back in the magazine which would reveal how cleverly the artist had hidden it from us. If we study the landscape we realize that the whole picture was painted in such a way as to conceal the real picture within and once we see the real picture it stands out clearly and we wonder how we missed it.

Today the employment picture is like this – institutions are not working well, solutions of the past only seem to compound the problems and deeper currents of change influence everything we experience. When we look at the world, so much is happening so fast in so many areas of life that many seem no longer to have a frame of reference within which to understand the meaning of our times. But like the hidden picture I believe the answers are within the texture of our lives, the principles within our stored memory and the way out of the maze the task of leadership.

There is a simple key to this new frame of reference and the new world of work. It is this: the availability of unlimited technical power is opening up the greatest vistas of possibility America, and the world, have ever known. Unlimited technical power is being given to a rapidly increasing number of citizens and institutions. That vastly increases both life's possibilities and dangers. It also changes the operation imperatives of every institution – including the ILO.

Unlimited technical power: you can stand on top of Mount Everest, pull out your pocket telephone, and talk to someone at the bottom of the Grand Canyon. Perhaps sooner than most people realize it will be possible to carry a pen-sized device in one's pocket that will enable voice conversation anywhere on earth. The microchip: it is redesigning both corporations and nations. We are not simply going through a rough patch and things will soon be back to something we like to think of as normal. The old normalcy has gone. We are passing through a shift from one order of life to another order; from national economics to the global economy. Part of the shift from the modern age to a new period is the restructuring of the global economy. This shift may help explain why recent economic growth in the OECD countries has been at its weakest in at least 45 years and unemployment so high in all our countries.

Having said that, I am aware of the difficulty of trying to peer too far into the future. History books are full of intemperate forecasts made by eminent prognosticators. Among these are Dr. Dionysus Larder, Professor of Natural Philosophy at University College, London, who said in 1823 that: "Rail travel at high speed is not possible because passengers, unable to breathe, would die of asphyxia." President Rutherford B. Hayes told Alexander Graham Bell in 1876 that: "[The telephone is] an amazing invention, but who would ever want to use one." IBM Chairman, Thomas Watson in 1943 remarked: "I think there is a world market for about five computers." But perhaps the most myopic summary of all comes from none other than US Commissioner of Patents, Charles Duell, who, in 1899, urged President McKinley to abolish the Patent Office, saying: "Everything that can be invented has been invented." He seemed to be suggesting that we have a great future behind us.

Today, the linkage of computers, telephones, television, faxes, satellites, lasers and fibre optics, all transmitting digitally encoded information, is creating a new force – telepower. In a sense, the impressive growth of private employment agencies which recognize the specific training and knowledge-intensive requirements for jobs in the telepower culture is a manifestation of this new economic order. Manpower Inc., our largest Temporary Work Agency (TWA), is now also the largest private employer in the United States, employing nearly 600,000 workers annually.

The shift from the somewhat abnormal prosperity of the cold war economy to something approaching a peacetime status is creating a sea change in thousands of United States companies. Military spending will have dropped 40 per cent between 1989 and 1996 in the United States. Thus, entire industries are redefining both products and markets. These conditions require the maximum utilization of flexible resources of the kind and in the magnitude offered by private employment agencies. An unusual amount of labour market churning is going on – many new jobs are being created, many experienced and highly trained workers are suddenly available for placements, many laid-off workers are in need of retraining and/or job-search assistance – so there is more than enough work for private and public agencies to coexist comfortably.

As a friend engaged in preparing the "unemployable" for employment recently told me: "The simple fact is that for the young and old, the handicapped or disabled, women, men, new entrants or laid-off workers – unless they have employable skills, are motivated to succeed, and willing to learn – they do not break out of the wretched corner of unemployment."

This brings us to the greatest challenge – the spiritual well-being of mankind. "There is a coarseness, a callousness, a cynicism, a banality, and a vulgarity to our time," states one commentator. We are "defining deviancy down" in Senator Moynihan's memorable phrase. And in the process, we are losing a once reliable sense of civic and moral outrage in many societies.

We have been impressed with the work of the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations (CEACR) at this Conference – the humanity and civic virtues manifest at its concluding session were particularly impressive. I was reminded of William Faulkner's 1950 Nobel Prize acceptance speech in which he declared: "I decline to accept the end of man." Man will not merely endure but prevail because, as Faulkner said, he alone among creatures "has a soul, a spirit capable of compassion and sacrifice and endurance".

This is the very spirit of the ILO. It must in the same way decline to accept the end of moral man. Liberty-loving people everywhere understand the rightness of our cause. Peace, prosperity, spiritual progress, freedom and human dignity are enshrined in our principles. We must carry on the struggle for our children – and beyond. We must push back hard against an age that is pushing hard against us.

When we do, we will emerge victorious against the trials of our time. Dwight Eisenhower, looking down Omaha Beach 20 years after D-Day was moved to say: "They did it so that the world could be free. It just shows what free men will do rather than be slaves." Perhaps Edmund Burke said it best: "There is but one law for all, namely, that law which governs all law, the law of our Creator, the law of humanity, justice, equity – the law of nature and of nations."

May we all bring our best efforts to the great work which lies before us.

Original German: Mr. ADAMY (Workers' adviser, Germany) – On this 75th anniversary, we once again reaffirm the basic values of the International Labour Organization, including, in particular, the often-cited principle incorporated in the Treaty of Versaille that labour should not be regarded merely as a commodity.

This principle must not be forgotten today and the forces of a commodity market should not be applied to the labour market. This applies, in particular, to private employment agencies which must remain unprejudiced and neutral. If the balance of forces in the labour market is not to be influenced further to the disadvantage of the unemployed and the workers, there is a particular need for protection, and our national constitutional court has specifically affirmed this fact. This very sensitive area has reiterated that need and stressed it repeatedly. Given the current situation of the labour market, imperfections and deficiencies soon become apparent, and these inevitably result in exploitation and undermine both employers and workers.

Some of the major dangers of private employment agencies are described under paragraphs 29 to 33 of the conclusions which are now before us. As trade unionists we see a need for action with regard to a reform of these agencies, in order to draw up international labour standards, not with a view to eliminating existing standards but because reform is necessary as the labour market has undergone extensive economic and social change. However, we must take care not to throw away the baby with the bath water.

I share the assessment of the American Minister of Labor who at the Informal Tripartite Meeting at the Ministerial Level on Employment, warned that the deficiencies in the employment policies drawn up immediately after the First World War should not be repeated now and that the principle of flexibility should not be misunderstood. Rather than hiring and firing, flexibility should mean increased emphasis on skills upgrading and should lead to the mobilization of enterprises.

The proposed conclusions before you state under point 1 that full and productive employment should be the top priority on the agenda of policy-makers and that this objective should be supported by active economic and financial policies. But it is precisely those who reject this employment policy responsibility who are the most vehement about the authorization of profit-making employment agencies. This also applies to my country. To date I am unaware of any investigation which demonstrates that private employment agencies are more efficient economically speaking than public employment agencies. Even in the work of the Committee this matter remained unresolved. The wrong methodology was applied in my country in the assessment of this issue and the resulting data is inappropriate for international comparisons.

International comparative investigations have shown, on the contrary, that on a purely quantitative basis the public employment agencies in Germany are as important as the public and private agencies in the United Kingdom combined.

A problem remaining open which deserves further discussion is how to assess the qualitative aspects of employment processes which are aimed at lasting insertion into the labour market taking into account the current labour legislation protection. In my view, countries having a system of private employment agencies are also faced with the problem of unemployment and have not succeeded in solving this any better than those countries in which public employment agencies are responsible for the distribution of jobs. Those few areas in which in my own country profit-making agencies are allowed, demonstrate that they are increasingly open to abuse. Triangular relations connected with the contracting of employees often operate to the disadvantage of the weaker partner, at least in the longer term.

Unfortunately, in the conclusions insufficient attention is devoted to the varying forms of private employment agencies so that above and beyond the results of the work of the Committee there is a need for further discussion and clarification. If we are prepared to adopt these conclusions, that is because, as far as we are concerned, charitable agencies and non-profit making agencies do in fact complement public employment agencies in a very useful way.

The conclusions on private employment agencies should not, however, be taken to mean that the market should be a purely self-regulatory entity. Private employment agencies should only be authorized providing they follow the principles of tripartism, taking account of the interests of both unemployment and workers, as well as the interests of the national economy and society as a whole, while at the same time effectively avoiding abuse. Otherwise there is a danger of distorted social development as a consequence of the current great social challenges, and this would be contrary to the basic values of our Organization.

We should all contribute to the 75th anniversary of the ILO not becoming a turning-point fraught with problems for us all.

The PRESIDENT – The adoption of the report of the Committee on Private Employment Agencies involves not only the adoption of the summary of the Committee's discussions, but also the adoption of the resolution and the conclusions submitted by the Committee.

I now turn to the adoption of the report, that is paragraphs 1 to 101. May I take it that the report is adopted?

(The report is adopted, paragraphs 1 to 101.)

RESOLUTION CONCERNING THE ROLE OF PRIVATE EMPLOYMENT AGENCIES IN THE FUNCTIONING OF LABOUR MARKETS, SUBMITTED BY THE COMMITTEE ON PRIVATE EMPLOYMENT AGENCIES: ADOPTION

The PRESIDENT – Let us now proceed to the adoption of the resolution concerning the role of private employment agencies in the functioning of labour markets. If there are no objections, may I take it that this resolution is adopted.

(The resolution is adopted.)

CONCLUSIONS CONCERNING THE ROLE OF PRIVATE EMPLOYMENT AGENCIES IN THE FUNCTIONING OF LABOUR MARKETS, SUBMITTED BY THE COMMITTEE ON PRIVATE EMPLOYMENT AGENCIES: ADOPTION

The PRESIDENT – We now move on to the adoption of the conclusions concerning the role of private employment agencies in the functioning of labour markets, part by part. If there are no objections, I shall take it that paragraphs 1 to 55 are adopted.

(Paragraphs 1 to 55 are adopted seriatim.)

REPLY BY THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL TO THE DISCUSSION OF HIS REPORT

The PRESIDENT – I now have the honour and privilege to invite Mr. Michel Hansenne, Secretary-General of the Conference and Director-General of the ILO, to reply to the discussion of his Report.

Original French: The SECRETARY-GENERAL – I hope you will allow me, at the beginning of this reply, to tell you about some of my feelings at the end of this session of the Conference now that we have an opportunity to recall some of the most important moments we have experienced during this anniversary year.

My first feeling is one of joy – joy because the mandate of the International Labour Organization and its objectives have been renewed by all our constituents. I would like, in particular, to thank the 131 ministers who have attended the Conference and the very many employer and trade union personalities who honoured us with their presence.

After this feeling of joy, comes a feeling of pride – pride that the commitment you have taken today brings together 171 countries. And this figure of 171 member States in the Organization has been achieved by the return to the fold, after too long an absence, of South Africa. This return is, to me, the most tangible proof that our contribution to the struggle against apartheid has not been in vain.

Finally, there is a feeling of satisfaction, since it has been clear to us all that this year we have had – not just in the plenary sittings but in various other meetings – a particularly candid and open discussion focused on the subjects for which we were convened: the 75th anniversary of this Organization and its future. This gives me a feeling of satisfaction, because I have realized that whatever your assessment of it, the Report I have had the honour to present to you, has had the effect of provoking debate rather than stifling it.

Is it possible, already at this point in time, tentatively to take stock of your reactions? My role, at the end of these discussions, is obviously not one of making a final judgement on the way in which they progressed, nor on the results which we can expect from them, but rather one of presenting to you the way we should go about the follow-up. This task has, without any doubt, been rendered much easier for me by the resolutions which you have adopted and which will serve us as guidelines for the future. It should be remembered that, when our Conference adjourns, it is not the end of our debates – rather it is just the beginning. Moreover, the short-term demands that have to be met should under no circumstances conceal the long-term requirements for the renovation of our Organization.

When I took the floor on the first day of this session of the Conference, I told you that the ILO had to take up a triple challenge. The first was directed at our constituents and concerned the relevance and effectiveness of our tripartite structure. The second concerned mainly the Secretariat and related to the capacity of the International Labour Office to reorientate its programmes of activity. The third challenge was addressed to the whole of the international community and dealt with its ability to organize itself to tackle the economic and social stakes at play in accelerated trade globalization.

I would begin my reply by taking up this last subject and looking, first of all, at the activities we need to undertake in the context of the World Summit for Social Development to be held next year. As you are well aware, our contribution to this Summit and, more broadly, our role in the international system are, I believe, one of the most important concerns for the future of our Organization. Very fortunately, this is one of the questions on which we have, I think, made considerable progress during this session. I would therefore, first of all, like to express my gratitude to the Secretary-General of the United Nations Organization, Mr. Boutros-Ghali, for the importance he attaches to our Organization within the United Nations system devoted, as it is, to the tasks of promoting peace and development; my thanks also go to him for his emphasis on the major role the ILO has to play in the preparation, organization and follow-up of the World Summit for Social Development.

I would also like to thank Ambassador Somavia for his participation and the statements he made to the Informal Tripartite Meeting at the Ministerial Level on Employment which we organized to prepare for the Summit. A total of 109 ministers and many leading personalities from trade unions and employers' organizations participated in the discussions that day. All delegations agreed in emphasizing the essential role the ILO had to play, and discussed the manner of its participation. The document which had been prepared by the Office at the request of the Preparatory Committee for the Summit garnered very positive comments. It will be revised in the light of the discussions during the meeting and, thanks to the support it received from you all, I am sure this document will have a very particular status and will be of special importance during the next stages of the preparatory work for the Summit.

By way of conclusion to that meeting, Ambassador Somavia expressed the firm hope that on returning home, we would continue our efforts in order to motivate our constituents and, through them, public opinion in all of our countries on what is at stake at that Summit. I think that once this condition has been met, we can make the Summit a success and look ahead with optimism to the role which we will have to play tomorrow, in cooperation with other international institutions, to direct economic growth towards more employment and greater social justice.

However, I would like to say straight away how pleased I have been to hear so many ministers and delegates give their immediate support to the idea of permanent machinery for consultation with international institutions with a financial, economic and commercial function. Mr. Delamuraz, Federal Councillor of the Swiss Confederation, did just that during the commemorative session. The Ministers of Labour of Denmark, Ireland, Nicaragua, Netherlands, Poland and the United Republic of Tanzania, in particular, repeated the same wish in their statements. And you have also, Mr. President, emphasized this in your introductory address.

But our role and our importance will depend in the final analysis on the way – be it good, bad or mediocre – in which we assume our responsibilities. This brings me to the few words I would like to say about the second challenge I mentioned in my opening statement – the renewal of our activities. As you know, we have obviously not exhausted the debate on this subject. The discussions we had, I believe, focused more on the improvements to be made to what we are doing now than on potential innovations – either those I proposed in my Report, or others. This is not surprising, as everyone had but ten minutes to speak, and in ten minutes you have to move along very quickly and focus on the most essential points, leaving it up to the Office and the Governing Body to follow up the task. This is the essential role you have entrusted to these two bodies in your resolution.

In my Report, I drew your attention to the role the ILO should, in my opinion, play with regard to employment. The creation of productive and freely chosen employment is most certainly a priority and must be at the very heart of the ILO's activities. We must try to seek out innovative solutions which combine the need to develop sources of employment and the need to respect human dignity. Against this backdrop we must also take into consideration the irreplaceable role of the enterprise, and in particular small and medium-sized enterprises. Many speakers have emphasized this point, in particular Mr. Decosterd, the Employers' delegate of Switzerland.

I noted, during the discussions at the Informal Tripartite Meeting at the Ministerial Level on Employment, that there were many points on which we had the same views. We all agreed, first of all, that healthy macroeconomic conditions constitute the necessary framework for job creation and therefore the preparation of an employment policy. We all agreed, also, that the future of employment and growth lies in the liberalization of markets. On that occasion, I did not hear any speech advocating protectionism. We all pleaded for the implementation of an active employment policy to work in harmony with market forces. In particular, this policy would have to revolve around vocational training, the encouragement of certain sectors of the economy, new methods of organizing labour and production that are more likely to generate employment, and a greater degree of flexibility. However, many of us believe that further consideration is needed to clarify this point because flexibility is not without ambiguity; there are forms of flexibility which exploit and debase, and others which liberate and make work more humane. We all agreed that these policies presuppose very solid partners in the employment market and that consultation between the various social actors was an essential prerequisite for the success of these policies. This also led us to emphasize finally the importance of the role of ministers of labour and the need to involve them more closely in the decision-making process, both at the national and international level. Many of you welcomed what was said by Mrs. Osseni, Minister of Labour, Employment and Social Affairs of Benin, who reminded us that ministers of employment and labour are not firemen whom you only call when the fire has taken hold.

The success of the meeting of 10 June strengthens my conviction that it would be useful for the Office to draft an annual report containing an analysis of the employment situation around the world and the effects of economic and financial policies. I continue to believe that the Conference should have a standing item on its agenda concerning the problems of employment and standards of living throughout the world. I would like in particular to thank the Ministers of Labour of Cyprus, Egypt, Kuwait, Peru, Philippines and Turkey, who were among those who supported and encouraged this proposal. As the passage in my Report which deals with these questions has not provoked any major opposition, my budgetary proposals to the Governing Body for 1996-97, will contain provisions to this effect.

With regard to the creation of employment, a huge question mark still remains as to links with the globalization of trade and the opening up of national markets. The debate on what we know as the "social clause" was particularly lively and impassioned. However, as Mr. Tapiola, Workers' delegate of Finland, said, I think we should find a more appropriate expression. He quite rightly stated that "there is no one ready-made product called the social clause which should or should not be integrated into trade policies and measures. There are many explanations and very many misrepresentations, some of them deliberate, on what we mean by this issue." What we, in fact, must discuss is the expediency and ways and means of possibly including social components in international trade.

Mr. Friso, General Secretary, speaking on behalf of the ICFTU and Mr. Custer, General Secretary, speaking on behalf of the World Confederation of Labour, expressed very clearly the fears of workers at the prospect of trade barriers coming down and unbearable situations for workers arising.

Those who oppose the social clause themselves expressed the fear that it might be used for protectionist purposes. Mr. Latief, Minister of Manpower of Indonesia, said that a link of this nature might create "undesirable distortions to the detriment of the general welfare". Similar statements were made in particular by governments which had supported the proposed resolution opposing the introduction of such a clause, including Malaysia and Singapore.

I think, however, that the Conference has helped us to move along this debate. We have heard qualified statements taking into account various views. I would like to mention, by way of example, what was said by Mr. Kang, Vice-Minister of the Ministry of Labour of the Republic of Korea, and Mr. Khalil El Fadhel, Minister of Social Affairs of Tunisia.

Please permit me, on my own behalf to draw some conclusions from the debate, although I recognize this is not an easy task.

I would like to note, first of all, that all those who spoke in favour of a guarantee of workers' rights have never called into question the right to development. Mr. Brett, Workers' delegate of the United Kingdom and Vice-Chairman of the Governing Body, was very clear on this subject, stating that for the workers the social clause "is not about the protection of trade, but the protection of people. It is not about establishing minimum wages across the world. It is not about transferring first-world wage levels in terms of conditions to developing countries".

I have observed – and this is my second point – that those who advocate the right to development have never maintained that this right could be allowed to undermine the fundamental rights of workers. There is a consensus that all countries should try to abolish labour practices which violate fundamental human rights. Mr. Sangma, Minister for Labour of India, could not have put this argument more forcefully.

Thirdly, I have noted that many agreed with Mr. Reich, Secretary of Labor of the United States, when he said that it would be preferable for any intervention in this area to be authorized and implemented multilaterally rather than on a unilateral basis.

Finally, I concur with the views of Mr. Blum, Federal Minister of Labour and Social Affairs of Germany, who said that although there was concern that social clauses might be misused for protectionist purposes, this could not be invoked as a reason for the ILO to ignore the subject.

The ILO of course cannot avoid this debate. On the contrary, it must try to clarify it and see it in its correct context.

Our task is not only to try to attain social justice, but also to bring about economic progress which generates employment. We have to see how we can make sure that the benefits of international trade are fairly and equitably distributed amongst all those who have contributed to the creation of this wealth. We must see how we can reconcile freedom of trade, freedom of association and free negotiation by workers of their conditions of employment and labour. This is what the role of the ILO is all about. And now it must set out to examine all the possible ways in which it can, in a new international context, re-examine all its objectives – which may sometimes be divergent but never contradictory.

I intend to propose to the Governing Body to set up a working group to provide a more in-depth analysis of the apprehensions and constraints facing each and every one of us and to try to find some solutions to our problems.

This leads me quite naturally to the subject of the standard-setting activities of the Organization, which has been one of its major areas of concern during the past 75 years. I am pleased to see that these activities have received a great deal of support within the Conference, even though they have been seriously challenged, either explicitly or implicitly, by some – particularly those in the Employers' group. Mr. Laurin, Employers' delegate, Sweden, said that the ILO standard-setting machinery today was not very useful and even rather counter-productive. Other statements were also very critical, including those of other Employers' delegates such as Mr. Thüsing, Germany, and Mr. Moorhead, United States.

Generally speaking though, we saw that there was a large majority who believed in the essential role of international labour standards. Mr. Giraud, Minister of Labour, Employment and Vocational Training of France, emphasized that there could be no goal of profit without an assertion of social and human responsibility; and Mr. Peirens, spokesman of the Workers' group in the Committee on the Application of Standards, also said that the ILO and its basic principles are even more important today than they have been in the past, in dealing with unbridled competition, social exclusion and poverty. He also pointed out that the Workers' group firmly believed that the ILO should continue to draw up international labour standards.

According to Mr. Core, Government delegate, Australia, the relevance of the ILO is demonstrated year after year by the adoption, ratification and application of international labour standards.

The efforts of the Organization in this area are indeed still very topical. This has been borne out by the discussions which have taken place, in the course of the Conference, on part-time work and on health and safety in mines. New standards – a Convention and Recommendation – should be adopted tomorrow, and others could follow next year. Furthermore, the Committee on Private Employment Agencies recommended the revision of Convention No. 96, which gave a monopoly or excessive privilege to public employment agencies. All these were discussions on very topical and important subjects, and an expression of our ability to move forward and to renew ourselves and our Organization.

I note that the resolution concerning the 75th anniversary of the ILO and its future orientation gives important support to strengthening the promotion and application of the fundamental Conventions – Conventions Nos. 87 and 98, on freedom of association and collective bargaining, Nos. 29 and 105, on the abolition of forced labour, and Nos. 100 and 111, on equality of opportunity and treatment.

The defence and promotion of the fundamental rights of working men and women remain of course a fundamental responsibility of our Organization. None the less, we must bear in mind our commitment and our resolution concerning the fundamental Conventions of the ILO; but while so doing we should not forget that many statements criticized various aspects of those standard-setting activities, and emphasized the need to improve them because – whether we like it or not – there is a problem with ratification and therefore a problem of credibility. Many of you, in plenary and in the Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations, expressed criticisms, sometimes strong criticisms, about the way in which the standard-setting activities were undertaken, and made specific suggestions in this respect. Improvements should be made in the elaboration and promotion procedures and the supervising of standards.

These proposals could very well build on points of view put forward in the Committee on the Application of Standards by the spokesmen of the Employers' and Workers' groups, and by very many Governments. They referred to: the speed at which standards are adopted; possible updating and revision; the topical needs and importance of the subjects; the need for new standards to retain their universal nature and a better use of flexibility clauses.

Similarly, the way in which we draft questionnaires could also be reviewed, as could the procedures of the Conference committees which prepare standards. The general surveys, based on article 19 of the Constitution, could be more widely used for this purpose. All these questions will be covered in a document which will be discussed by the Governing Body next November and which will allow us to adopt new working practices and methods in this area.

I think, however, that we will make quicker and more substantial progress in renewing our standard-setting activities if we limit our work to renewing standards, i.e. adapting them and updating them, rather than undermining them or calling them into question. In the speech that he made yesterday at the invitation of our International Institute for Social Studies, Professor René Jean Dupuy recalled that the ILO was a special organization in so far as it was the only international organization whose set of values had not been undermined for 75 years. These values of law, justice, dignity and freedom should be the cornerstone of all our activities. On no account – and this constitutes a real danger – should we underestimate our activities and consider as patronizing any attempts to help member States fulfil their ideals.

The ILO is not, and should not be, a simple technical implementing agency. Although it must always try to improve the quality of its products, it should constantly bear in mind the ethical values on which it was founded and which it has always upheld.

I think we need to remind ourselves of this constantly – and the same holds true when we look at another sector of our activities, namely technical cooperation.

Technical cooperation has not been at the centre of our concerns this year. This is quite understandable; we held very lengthy discussions on this subject last year and, at its November meeting the Governing Body will be looking at a strategy document on technical cooperation. However, in the light of comments made in the course of this Conference, I would like to underline what I think might constitute two major elements in this strategy.

We need to prepare and develop cooperation programmes which are technically well prepared, which focus on the ILO's fields of competence and which are in accordance with its basic philosophy. These programmes should meet the needs of member States and be such as to draw support from donor bodies and countries. The programme against child labour is a fine example. In the course of this session of the Conference, I had the opportunity to sign two new cooperation agreements with Pakistan and the Philippines and I have taken due note of the commitment of France, via the French Minister of Labour, Mr. Giraud, to contribute to the development of this programme which so far has been essentially, but not exclusively, supported by Germany. I would like to express my thanks to all those States which have offered us support in this field, and I invite all other member States to join in the effort. A similar programme is being implemented in the field of the development and improvement of labour relations, particularly in Latin America, with the assistance of Spain. There are vast opportunities for ILO action in this area, which I believe warrants our attention. Other projects are now being prepared. We will have the opportunity to discuss them in much greater length in the Governing Body this autumn.

I have taken note of the requests made in many statements for our employment promotion efforts to be backed up at the national level by an efficient technical cooperation programme. The latter should combine policy research and advisory services on general policy with the implementation and execution of projects. The multidisciplinary teams which were recently set up are at the core of this strategy. Several of you have expressed explicit support for them. For example, Mr. Guzmán Matta, Employers' delegate, Chile, considered that these would be an effective way of bringing the ILO's point of view, and the institutional support which is necessary, closer to the different circumstances of each country. That is precisely what we are trying to do through the multidisciplinary teams.

Our technical assistance was particularly solicited in the course of a special sitting devoted to the question of the occupied Arab territories. Most of you welcomed the initiative taken by the Office to identify the most urgent needs in the occupied Palestinian territories. Special mention was made of projects aimed at covering such needs by creating jobs, alleviating poverty and establishing social protection.

The second theme of our technical cooperation strategy is, as many of you have noted, concentrated on strengthening the ability of ministers of labour and employment and of employers' and workers' organizations to take initiatives and action. I intend to suggest that the Organization concentrates more on this issue. In this connection, I believe it is essential, particularly at this time of accelerating economic development, to consolidate national structures and procedures to this end.

The resolution concerning the 75th anniversary of the ILO and its future orientation makes a renewed appeal for the promotion of the fundamental values of the Organization, the first of which is tripartism.

The dramatic political changes which have recently taken place in the world and the consolidation of democratic principles which accompanied them should, by their very nature, give fresh impetus to tripartism. When put into practice at all levels and in all aspects of social policy, tripartism is not only an essential guarantee of social justice, but also a guarantee of the effectiveness of these policies. The Organization is fortunate enough to reflect this structure in its very composition. In my Report to the Conference I suggested that other groups should contribute to our thoughts on the subject. I still believe that this is essential, while emphasizing for all to hear that enlisting these groups in our work and our reflections by no means signifies a challenge to the tripartite structure of the Organization.

"As far as we are concerned, this is the beginning. Today is the first day of the rest of our lives." That is what Mr. Liebenberg, Employers' delegate, South Africa, said to us yesterday as the Committee on Action against Apartheid was deciding to repeal the Declaration against this scourge and to dissolve itself. It was a moving moment at this Conference, as was the moment when we welcomed the return of South Africa to the Organization with a delegation which represented for the first time a non-racial, democratically elected Government from this great country.

"As far as we are concerned, this is the beginning." That is what he said. I believe that these words apply equally to the work of this Conference, where we have at considerable length discussed the future of this Organization. We have not yet said everything there is to say on this subject. We have begun drawing the blueprint, and started on the work. It is now up to us to be the architects and builders of our future. We must make every effort to further the cause of social justice – the cause to which we are all, as you have confirmed, so greatly attached. That is all, but it is a great deal.

The PRESIDENT – Mr. Director-General, I hardly know where to begin to thank you for your Report. But on behalf of the delegates let me say that I found it to be thoughtful, insightful, elucidating and pertinent to the points which the delegations raised here. I find it nothing short of a little miracle. Thank you very much for your comments.

(The Conference adjourned at 12.45 p.m.)

Twenty-seventh sitting

Thursday, 23 June 1994, 3 p.m.

President: Mr. Gray

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON PART-TIME WORK: SUBMISSION, DISCUSSION AND ADOPTION

The PRESIDENT – The only item on the agenda this afternoon is the report of the Committee on Part-Time Work, found in Provisional Record No. 23. Apart from the report itself, which contains a summary of the Committee's discussion, the Conference also has before it a proposed Convention and a proposed Recommendation.

It is my pleasure at this time to ask the Officers of the Committee to come to the rostrum: the Chairperson, Mr. Rood, Government delegate, Netherlands; the Employer Vice-Chairperson, Mr. Noakes, Employers' delegate, Australia; the Worker Vice-Chairperson, Ms. Van Den Burg, Workers' delegate, Netherlands; and the Reporter, Ms. Samuel, Government adviser, Cyprus, who will submit the report to the Conference.

Ms. SAMUEL (Government adviser, Cyprus; Reporter of the Committee on Part-Time Work) – It has been my pleasure and privilege to serve for a second time as the Reporter of the Committee on Part-Time Work. I can confess to you, however, that it was only through full-time and sometimes overtime work that the Committee has managed to accomplish its mandate.

Last year's extensive discussion had clarified many issues, which facilitated our work. Several points, however, were raised again (as expected) and discussed in detail.

The Employers' group continued to have reservations as to whether part-time work was a suitable subject for regulation through ILO instruments. In their view, part-time work, by its very nature, required a high degree of flexibility and any instrument would detract from this flexibility. Recognizing, however, the particular importance of part-time work and the opportunities which it offered for both employers and workers, they were prepared to support a Recommendation containing general guidelines, provided a Convention was not adopted.

The Workers' group advocated that the development of modern and topical standards on part-time work, which was becoming increasingly important in both developing and industrialized countries, would be one of the contributions that the ILO could make towards its fundamental goal of social justice. Moreover, in view of the employment problems in many countries, providing protection could be instrumental in increasing the willingness of workers to opt for part-time work. Despite the reservations of the Employers' group and of some Government members, the Committee decided that a Convention accompanied by a Recommendation should be adopted.

The report which you have before you details the deliberations of the Committee. I am particularly pleased to inform the Conference that the atmosphere in which these deliberations were carried out was enviable. Constructive dialogue and a genuine effort to find solutions by consensus prevailed through the Committee's work.

The proposed Convention fully meets, in my view, the aim of the Committee which, from the first discussion, was to adopt a flexible and widely ratifiable instrument focusing on basic protection and broad principles in which the interests of employers and workers were taken into account.

The Preamble was amended to recognize not only the need to ensure protection for part-time workers in the areas of access to employment, working conditions and social security but also the need for employment policies to take into account the role of part-time work in facilitating additional employment opportunities. The concept of a comparable full-time worker, which was incorporated last year after a lengthy discussion into the crucial definition of part-time worker, as well as in many of the operative provisions of the proposed Convention, was amended to make even clearer the points of comparison between part-time and full-time workers.

With a view to rendering the proposed Convention flexible, the Committee retained unchanged the provisions relating to the possibility for exclusion from the scope of the proposed Convention particular categories of workers or of establishments when its application to them would raise particular problems of a substantial nature. It also endorsed the provisions agreed upon last year regarding the areas of protection of part-time workers in relation to comparable full-time workers, as well as those on the possibility of excluding from the scope of protection part-time workers whose earnings or hours of work fell below specified thresholds. The Committee agreed, however, to add sick leave to the fields of protection and to preclude the application of thresholds as a condition for access to maternity protection measures other than those provided under statutory social security schemes. The latter was considered necessary, particularly as the vast majority of part-time workers are women.

The provision on the transfer from full-time to part-time employment and vice-versa was amended to ensure that transfers would be voluntary, in accordance with national law and practice.

Coming now to the proposed Recommendation, again I believe that it meets the Committee's aims, which were to illustrate how the provisions of the proposed Convention could be applied and to indicate additional areas to which protection for part-time workers should be extended. As in the case of the proposed Convention, thanks to the good work done last year, the amendments made were not extensive.

It is worth pointing out, however, that a new provision was added to the effect that, where part-time workers had more than one job, their total hours of work, contributions or earnings should be taken into account in determining whether they meet threshold requirements in statutory social security schemes based on occupational activity. Moreover, amendments were made to the provisions relating to a worker's refusal to transfer from full-time to part-time work, and to the counting of part-time workers in cases where obligations on employers depend on the number of workers they employ.

In short, the proposed Convention and Recommendation contain provisions which ensure that part-time workers enjoy protection which is the same or equivalent to that of comparable full-time workers, and which facilitates access to freely chosen part-time work to meet the needs and interests of both workers and employers.

Before concluding, I would like to pay tribute again to the impeccable chairmanship of Mr. Max Rood who led the Committee, as he did superbly last year, to the successful conclusion of its work one whole day earlier than scheduled. His expertise, skills and good humour contributed greatly to the excellent working atmosphere and to the smooth running of the Committee. The fact that voting was used only three times reflects the constructive attitude and the will to find solutions through consensus of both Vice-Chairpersons, Mr. Noakes and Ms. Van Den Burg. Warm congratulations are due to both of them. The conciliatory interventions of the Government members of the Committee also helped to resolve difficult issues and to produce balanced texts. The advice of the representative of the Secretary-General, Mr. Dumont, and his team proved most valuable and was highly appreciated. The precise work of the Drafting Committee also contributed to the successful completion of our work.

To commemorate the 75th anniversary of the ILO, it would be most befitting for the Conference to adopt the Part-Time Work proposed Convention as its 175th Convention. This would, in my opinion, constitute a formal acknowledgement of the need for a global approach to this form of work, which already concerns tens of millions of workers, and which is expanding rapidly in both industrialized and developing countries.

With this thought, I commend the report of the Committee on Part-Time Work to the Conference for adoption.

The PRESIDENT – The report is now open for discussion.

Mr. NOAKES (Employers' delegate, Australia; Vice-Chairperson of the Committee on Part-Time Work) – The report that is now placed before the Conference represents the results of a first discussion and a second discussion concerning part-time work. At the beginning of those discussions, the Employer members of the Committee made it clear that they were opposed to the adoption of instruments in part-time work. They stated their firm view that, in a world in which priority consideration must be given to job creation, the encouragement of regulation or further regulation of part-time work would be counter-productive. They indicated that part-time work was an important and growing segment of employment in developed countries and would become more important in developing countries with the passage of time. Thus, while there was a need for universal recognition of the economic importance of the role played by part-time work and while employers were not opposed to fair treatment of part-time workers, they believed that it would be inappropriate to attempt to set new international standards on this subject.

At the outset of the second discussion, we attempted to persuade the Committee to reject the proposal for the adoption of a Convention on part-time work. In that context, we would have been prepared to support the adoption of a Recommendation drafted in appropriate terms. We were not able to persuade the Committee to our point of view, with the result that we remain firmly opposed to the adoption of standards on part-time work.

This outcome should not be seen as an adverse reflection on the work of the Committee which operated in an atmosphere of remarkable harmony and cooperation and which has achieved an improvement in the texts originally presented. However, for the Employers the issue of principle overrides the issue of the drafting of the proposed instruments. We are simply unable to support the adoption of a Convention and Recommendation on part-time work. It is the inherent flexibility of part-time work which is the basis of its value both to employers and workers who choose to offer or to accept part-time work for a wide variety of reasons. In our view, any regulation or further regulation of part-time work through the adoption of new international standards will inevitably detract from that inherent flexibility and will inevitably have adverse effects on employment opportunities.

I now wish to make some specific comments on the outcome of our work. Firstly and importantly it should be noted that there is now no conceptual opposition to part-time work from any significant quarter. Part-time work is now universally recognized as being part of the mainstream of working patterns and practices. This is a positive and encouraging development which is reinforced by the words of the Preamble and to a certain extent by the terms of Article 9 of the proposed Convention.

Secondly, the limits of the definition of a part-time worker must be clearly understood. There can in fact be no part-time worker for the purposes of the proposed instruments unless there is a comparable full-time worker. Comparability rests on three tests. Is the nature of the employment relationship the same? In other words, are the part-time worker and the full-time worker both temporary, both seasonal, or both permanent workers and so on. Are the part-time worker and the full-time worker performing the same type of work, and are the part-time worker and the full-time worker employed in the same establishment, or if not in the same enterprise, or if not in the same branch of activity? Understanding this definition is fundamental to an understanding of the proposed texts and the relevant paragraphs of the report clearly set out the basis on which the Committee reached agreement on the terms of this definition.

Thirdly, Article 5 of the proposed Convention states in essence that, subject to proportionality, the basic wage of a part-time worker shall not be lower than the basic wage of a comparable full-time worker if the sole reason for the difference is the fact that the worker is a part-time worker. This approach which the Committee took allows the differences to exist if there is a reason based on other factors such as the way in which the work is carried out, and the reference to performance-related pay in the text is important in this respect.

Fourthly, I want to say something about the promotion of part-time work which was part of the remit given to the Committee by the Governing Body. It is in our view unfortunate that a majority of governments oppose the use of this terminology in the proposed Convention. The alternatives which were adopted and which are now represented in Article 9 are useful but do not go far enough. The Employers would have preferred a much stronger text in which the promotion of part-time work was directly, rather than indirectly, addressed.

Also in relation to the proposed Convention, I wish to say something about Article 10 which deals with the voluntary nature of transfers from full-time work to part-time work or vice versa. The relevant paragraphs of the report, particularly paragraph 154, are important to an understanding of the basis on which this text was agreed. In relation to the proposed Recommendation, I want to express our regret concerning the terms of Paragraph 12, subparagraph 2. The notion that changes in the agreed work schedule and work beyond scheduled hours should be subject to unspecified restrictions reveals a lack of understanding by the Committee that the needs of both enterprises and workers have added to the inherent flexibility of part-time work to which I have already referred.

It is also important that I mention the terms of Paragraph 19 of the proposed Recommendation which deals with the question of possible termination of employment due to refusal to transfer from full-time to part-time work or vice versa. I draw attention to paragraphs 245-253 of the report in this respect. While refusal to transfer should not in itself lead to termination, other factors or associated factors, including breach of an agreement to accept transfer might lead to termination.

Finally, I want to say something about paragraph 21 and its relationship to Article 4 of the proposed Convention. The Committee spent a considerable time grappling with the apparent problem of the proportionality of part-time workers in relation to threshold numbers of employees for the establishment of bodies such as works councils. This difficulty was eventually resolved as is reported in paragraph 259 of the report by an understanding and I quote: "that the protection of the individual rights of part-time workers to act as workers' representatives was a separate issue from the determination of thresholds for the establishment of works councils". It was in the light of this understanding and its clear acceptance by a number of governments directly concerned with this issue that the Employers' members accepted the eventual text.

Furthermore, it is clear to us that the right to organize, the right to bargain collectively and the right to act as workers' representatives, as specified in Article 4, are universal rights which are enshrined in ILO Conventions, whereas the obligation to establish works councils is far from being universal and is not enshrined in an ILO Convention, but rather imposed by the legislation of a few countries.

I have already referred to the harmonious atmosphere in which the Committee conducted its work. In this respect, I would like to express our thanks to the Workers' Vice-Chairperson, Ms. Van Den Burg, who protected the interests of her group with skill and tenacity but who is always constructive in her approach and always sought consensus. We have on our side enjoyed the experience of working with her and with her colleagues. I would also thank our Reporter, Ms. Samuel, who has again produced an excellent report which accurately reflects our discussions.

Our thanks also go to Mr. Dumont, the representative of the Secretary-General and to the secretariat of the Committee who worked untiringly and with great precision under, at times, tremendous pressure.

Finally, I want to pay a special tribute to our Chairperson, Mr. Rood. That this Committee operated so efficiently and was such a pleasure to work in was due entirely to his skills, his patience and his unfailing sense of humour. He was indeed an outstanding chairperson. He has given years of distinguished service to this Conference, and he will not, after this Conference, be with us again, at least in his present capacity as leader of the delegation of his country. The Conference is losing a Committee chairperson and a delegate of very special qualities and I want to say to him, on behalf of our group and on my own behalf, that we will miss him greatly.

In conclusion, and with the reservations I have expressed concerning the adoption of the proposed instruments, I commend the report of the Committee on Part-Time Work to the Conference.

Ms. VAN DEN BURG (Workers' delegate, Netherlands; Worker Vice-Chairperson of the Committee on Part-Time Work) – During the process of decision-making that led to placing part-time work on the agenda of the Conference as a subject for standard setting, there have been serious doubts from different sides.

Several governments thought the issue to be not relevant enough for their countries; others too complicated for a universal approach. The Employers' group feared that regulation of part-time work restricted the possibilities for creating part-time employment all over the world under the condition of unrestricted maximum profitability. Within the Workers' group some feared that regulation also meant acceptance, whilst their organizations still opposed the introduction of part-time work. So it was not an easy subject.

Nevertheless, I think that the Governing Body made a very wise decision in November 1991 to place part-time work on the agenda of this session of the Conference. Their prediction that part-time work would be a fast and widespread phenomenon in the labour market of the nineties has been confirmed to an even larger extent than was expected.

Part-time work has become a universal phenomenon. In the OECD countries of approximately 400 million working people, 15 per cent, that is about 60 million workers, are engaged on a part-time basis – one out of eight persons of whom about 45 million are women.

In some countries, like my own, part-time work is even the most common pattern of work for women.

In the whole process of globalization of the economy, these part-time work patterns spread around the world at a very high speed. Countries that last year were freshly confronted with this issue at the Conference from a position of total ignorance, this year appear to be very interested in the discussion. It underlines that part-time work has spread all over the world.

I would like to summarize briefly in four points the main reasons why part-time work, as a universal problem, is such an important issue for the ILO. After that, I will go into the main aspects of the conclusions of the Committee, the proposed Convention and Recommendation and finally, I will conclude with some remarks about the proceedings of the work in the Committee.

In four points, I will try to make clear why the issue of part-time work deserves the full attention of the ILO and of all of you, delegates to this session of the Conference, irrespective of the different opinions and policies that you adopt. I will not conceal that also in the workers' organizations these opinions and policies vary. Nevertheless, nobody can close his or her eyes to the facts of reality.

Firstly, part-time work is an important element in the global economic developments which are creating new forms and patterns of employment. The standard full-time working pattern is no longer exclusively prevalent in these new trends. Entrepreneurs are seeking more flexibility and adaptability in production and work patterns. Particularly in the more and more important service sector, there is an overwhelming variety of employment types and work patterns and schedules. On several occasions during the discussions in our Committee reference has been made to the very recent OECD Jobs Study. In this study, flexibility is a key word, but, as I have argued previously, flexibility is not synonymous with deregulation. As far as part-time work is concerned, the report sees the advantages, but outlines the concept that it should be freely chosen part-time work, at the initiative of and corresponding to the demands of workers.

Some advantages of part-time work and more variety in work schedules are evident also from the workers' point of view. Others, simply reducing costs by unfair treatment and creating new sources of cheap labour, are not. I will come back to that.

The second point I want to mention is the role that part-time work may play in resolving the top priority problem of this decade: mass unemployment. Not only the creation of new jobs, but the fairer redistribution of jobs can play a major role. The White Paper of Mr. Delors, the President of the European Commission, entitled Growth, Competitiveness, Employment: the Challenges and Ways Forward into the 21st Century, explicitly mentions the role of part-time work in stabilizing the level of employment. If taken up as a broader policy to shorten working time in general, part-time work can play a role in some countries and some situations.

Is it not curious that whilst productivity rates have increased to a large extent during the past two decades, and that whilst the supply of labour is overwhelming, the average duration of full-time work for those who have not been hit by unemployment has also increased?

An interesting study that was recently published by Harvard economist Juliet Schor, entitled The Overworked American: the Unexpected Decline of Leisure, clearly outlines this trend. Since 1948 the productivity level of the American worker has doubled, but his or her average work week did not reduce to half, but instead increased by almost five hours – four weeks on a yearly basis! Instead of an increase in leisure time and time for other activities, the workload and pressure for overtime has risen, and this has not been compensated by double salaries and standards of living!

This brings me to the third reason for the importance of the issue of part-time work. It plays, and may play, an important role at the micro-economic level of the household, in the division of paid and unpaid labour between men and women. It is not a coincidence that part-time workers are for the most part women. Part-time work is part of the so-called "compromise strategy", that was analysed by another well-known OECD study, Shaping Structural Change – the Role of Women. Many women over the world are engaged in part-time jobs, because this is the only opportunity for them to combine paid work with family responsibilities. The study outlines the model for the future – the "new workers profile": women and men workers combining both paid labour and other tasks on a more equal basis. This profile was already sketched during the ILO's discussion on the Workers with Family Responsibilities Convention, 1981 (No. 156) and the Workers with Family Responsibilities Recommendation, 1981 (No. 165), adopted at the 1981 session of the Conference. This Recommendation alluded to the role of part-time work and it was not by accident that this ILO standard speaks of "workers", and not just women, with family responsibilities.

The last, but obviously not the least important reason is the fact that the acquired general standards of employment security, of protection and working conditions, are being increasingly undermined and circumvented in terms of their application to a growing number of workers, who, paradoxically, are often called "non-standard" or "atypical" workers, although those types of employment are becoming more and more standard! In the ILO's struggle for social justice it is of unprecedented importance that we remain alert to such developments and formulate policies to prevent us from stepping back in history and having to start all over again with protective measures and elementary workers' rights for precisely these groups, that are often the weakest groups in society.

I have heard several voices in this Conference pleading for a policy of restraint with respect to the development of new ILO standards. "We have already enough standards", they say, "it is better to revise them, or even get rid of them". The Minister of Social Affairs and Employment of my country was speaking about the maintenance of standards as being opposed to the development of new ones. In my opinion this is rather inconsistent. Is it not so, that one of the major threats to maintaining adequate standards is that they are undermined and weakened by the fact that new trends in labour relations are not fully covered by them, and that the growing mass of workers falls outside their protection? This is the case for burgeoning numbers of so-called "self-employed" workers, for example homeworkers – a category that will be dealt with at next year's session of the Conference. And it is, fully or partially, the case for the vast majority of these millions of part-time workers all over the world. I want to remind you of the position of the Government member of Sweden last year, who stated at the beginning of the discussion of the Committee that the creation of a separate instrument for part-time work should not be necessary. Ideally, she would have been right. But, I am sorry to say, the reality is different. I recommend that those delegates who are still not convinced should read the excellent reports that the ILO edited at the different stages of the discussion. I understand that the Government of Sweden in the meantime has changed its position, and is now convinced that it makes a lot of sense to have such a separate instrument as an addition to the so dearly cherished traditional standards.

That brings me to a closer examination of the instruments we have developed during the valuable discussions in the Conference Committee on Part-Time Work both last year and this.

The first remark I want to make on the proposed Convention and Recommendation, that they are additional instruments. They do not develop fully new standards, nor are they restricted to an insignificant small, specific group. No. The Convention and Recommendation, as they are before you in the report, intend to make well-known, fundamental and broadly endorsed standards of the International Labour Organization applicable to all part-time workers. Elementary general principles, such as equality of treatment and human dignity, have been elaborated for their specific situation, as a guideline for practice in the member States, whereas at this very moment, part-time workers are in many cases deprived of these elementary rights and protection and suffer discrimination.

This general approach can be found in the definition of part-time work developed after a long discussion during the first reading last year. This definition makes it very clear that the aim is to cover part-time workers under conditions that are already widely accepted for full-time workers. A part-time worker is referred to in relation to a "comparable full-time worker", whose conditions of course vary from country to country, and from sector to sector.

This is a universal, flexible and widely applicable formula that takes into account all the differences and peculiarities of the different countries and branches of activity. It has been further refined this year, to make clear that the intention is to cover all part-time workers, and make them subject only to the justified provisions that apply to the full-time workers with whom they can be properly compared.

This approach of providing part-time workers with the basic protection that full-timers, in all worldwide variety, enjoy is set forth in the proposed Convention and Recommendation. Some basic rights, such as freedom of association and collective bargaining, and the right to act as workers' representatives, should be guaranteed fully to the same extent as in the case of full-time workers.

For other provisions equivalent conditions are the starting points. This is, as has been patiently explained over and over again by the experts of the ILO secretariat, a flexible concept that gives space for proportionality, because with respect to many subjects, as for instance wages and social security provisions, it is evident that a pro rata treatment referring to hours of work or earnings is adequate. In the proposed Convention, even more flexibility is provided for by allowing exceptions to a certain extent, for example, with regard to thresholds in social security systems. In the meanwhile, the use of such exceptions is conditioned through provisions for consultation and monitoring by the ILO, and – not least of all – by the guideline in the proposed Recommendation that such threshold requirements should be progressively reduced.

As the delegates who were not involved in the discussion in the Committee can see, sometimes the debates were highly technical. The specific regulations on different social security schemes might very probably not be so relevant for them. It could have seemed a typical European discussion from time to time. Sometimes I have the impression that our European countries played the role of a sort of "blocking avant-garde" especially with respect to the social security provisions. If there had not been such advanced and complicated systems, and if a somewhat more global and less introspective approach had been adopted from time to time, the proposed Convention and Recommendation could have been somewhat simpler. It was clear for many countries that these debates were not so relevant. But once again for these other countries, they do not impose any additional obligations on them.

The main provisions of the proposed Convention and the guidelines of the proposed Recommendation are universally relevant. The formulation of the provisions has the flexibility that many governments fervently pleaded for, with a view to making it easier to ratify the proposed Convention afterwards. I have the impression that we succeeded in satisfying all their needs. And I firmly hope that this will become clear not only in their votes tomorrow, but also in the number and the speed of ratifications after the adoption of the proposed Convention.

A second point on the content of the instrument. Besides the provisions in which equal or equivalent treatment is formulated, there are some specific provisions that derive from the specific character of part-time work. This is for instance the case with the provision on transfers from full-time to part-time work or vice versa. It is made clear that such a transfer should be voluntary and not unilaterally imposed upon a worker. The proposed Recommendation supplements this with the provision that a worker's refusal to transfer should not be seen as a valid reason for termination of employment.

In the debate about these provisions, we have been very careful not to prescribe in detail how exactly such provisions should be applied. It is fully up to individual member States to bring such provisions into line with "national law and practice". This is another "flexibility" clause which makes these proposed instruments easily applicable. It does not impose obligations on member States with regard to part-time workers that do not exist already for full-time workers. And as far as specific provisions are concerned – like the one on transfer which does not constitute grounds for termination of employment – they have been carefully brought into line with general principles from other well-known ILO standards and endowed with flexibility clauses.

A last remark on the proposed instruments refers to the promotion of part-time work. As you may know, the Governing Body placed two aspects of part-time work on the agenda of the Conference: protection and promotion. In my opinion this is in line with the intentions of the Director-General through his Report on the occasion of the ILO's 75th anniversary to intensify the debate on employment and living standards held at this session of the International Labour Conference. For, as I mentioned at the beginning of my speech, part-time work is an important phenomenon in the sphere of employment creation, and many governments want to promote it.

I hope that they will adhere to the position that I have defended on behalf of the Workers' group in our Committee as far as the promotion of part-time work is concerned, that providing adequate protection for and ensuring the human dignity of part-time workers are the best promotional measures that can be imagined. I am fully convinced that this concept works, and that under such conditions part-time work can play a modest or maybe even a major role with respect to improving the employment situation, the flexibility of enterprises, and equality of opportunity on the labour market, and thus help us to achieve higher standards of living and greater social justice in our global economy.

Finally, I would like to add some words on the proceedings in the Committee on Part-Time Work. Much was said about it already at the last sitting of the Committee. The predominating atmosphere at the Committee meetings was of outstanding constructive cooperation.

The Chairman of the Committee, Mr. Rood, who is attending this Conference, alas, for the last time, was a guiding factor in that, and inimitable in his courtesy and accuracy.

Of course, he was supported by the excellent preparatory work of Mr. Dumont and his staff, and his work was given the finishing touch by Ms. Samuel in the report before you.

Also, my co-Vice-Chairman, Mr. Noakes, was a fair and able counterpart. The decisions in the Committee on, in total, almost 100 amendments have, with very few exceptions, been adopted unanimously. This is to be attributed also to Mr. Noakes.

I regret that the Employers' group did not afford him the opportunity to give a more positive opinion about the final result of this cooperation. As a negotiator I know how hard it is not to receive support from the people you represent for an acceptable result in which you invested a lot of time and energy. I would have granted Mr. Noakes also a more positive evaluation from his "backbenchers" so that we could both be "winners" at the end of the race.

I sincerely hope that those Employers' delegates who planned to vote against the proposed Convention or abstain, will thoroughly reflect on their position, bearing in mind the prejudice that would be caused if this proposed Convention did not enjoy universal support and was not given its due importance, taking into account the unique and unprecedented consensus and unanimity in this Committee during its second year.

With a similar appeal to governments that tend to be reluctant or have not yet made up their mind, I want to end this speech.

I am convinced that we will render the 75-year-old ILO a perfect service by adopting this adequate, well-considered, modern, flexible proposed Convention and Recommendation at our meeting tomorrow.

It would clearly demonstrate the youthfulness and capability of the 75-year-old.

Mr. ROOD (Government delegate, Netherlands; Chairman of the Committee on Part-Time Work) – When I had the honour and the privilege of presenting the first report of our Committee to the Conference last year, I expected that its work would again be difficult this year, and although the subject matter remained delicate and complicated, one might say the difficulties were mastered in a satisfactory way. Thanks to the excellent preparation of the Office, and notably of Mr. Dumont and his staff, and the extremely constructive atmosphere in the Committee which, by the way, was composed of the nicest group of people you could ever meet in the world, we were able to produce the clever instruments which are now before the Conference. The experienced reporter, Mrs. Samuel, very rightly stated some minutes ago that they are flexible and widely ratifiable.

I particularly thank our two Vice-Chairpersons, Ms. Van Den Burg and Mr. Noakes. As all of you who have worked in Committees on amendments tabled by either group know, the situation can generally be described in such work by the saying, "You win some, you lose some".

Our Committee was especially privileged having such excellent Vice-Chairpersons. When they won, they were modest, and when they lost, they were gracious.

Now you will, I hope, allow me to make a few observations about the proposed Convention and Recommendation and about the considerations the Conference might have as regards the adoption or rejection of these proposals.

Of late, we have heard, read and spoken a lot about the future of the standard-setting task of the ILO. There are reservations because the effectiveness of new instruments appears to be threatened by the low degree of acceptance by member States, especially as regards the ratification of Conventions. We seem to be convinced of the necessity for the ILO to limit itself to truly fundamental issues only, and to produce less detailed instruments than it has allegedly been doing in past years.

Of late, it seems even to have become customary to think that the low percentage of ratifications by member States is being caused by exactly these factors, and therefore primarily by the ILO itself. I beg to differ with that conventional wisdom. It seems to me that other reasons induce, or at least also induce, member States to slow their pace of acceptance of new ILO instruments.

These last 20 or 30 years have seen the birth of new, different international organizations gradually producing a growing number of Conventions. Member States therefore nowadays are being confronted with more, and even considerably more, requests for ratification of international instruments. These instruments have been drafted and adopted in the United Nations, in specialized agencies or in other international organizations such as the Council of Europe. There is no legal need for member States to make choices between the different instruments presented ratification. They may ratify them all. However, I believe that the consideration of such choices takes time and slows the eventual decision of whether to ratify new ILO instruments.

Indeed, one feels inclined to think that the need to weigh the different instruments with a view to their possible ratification serves as a kind of alibi to postpone decisions.

It has been said that the ILO should limit itself to instruments dealing with fundamental workers' rights only. But what exactly are fundamental workers' rights?

Surely, no one can have reservations about labelling the right to organize freely and to bargain collectively as fundamental rights. But if, for instance, part-time workers are being denied equal or equivalent treatment compared with full-time workers – are we then dealing with fundamental workers' rights? And before you feel inclined to answer that question in the negative, please take into account that it so happens that most part-time workers are women. What position do we take when considering a lack of protection in the field of social security when dealing with part-time workers? I therefore humbly raise the question of whether the concept of fundamental workers' rights is really helpful when deciding on which matters the ILO should develop instruments.

You will undoubtedly understand that a Committee such as ours must deal with these and other difficult questions in the course of its discussions. It then tries to find practicable and acceptable solutions. I do hope that Governments, Employers and Workers alike, when considering their votes tomorrow, are willing to look at these matters from the perspective I have tried to present.

Now, there is one last point which I would like to state briefly. The session of the Conference has been further shortened this year. The Committee therefore had at its disposal, for the discussion and examination of approximately 100 amendments, two days fewer than it had last year. Although I am well aware that it is not for a simple Chairman of a Committee to decide the length of the annual session of the Conference, but rather for the ILO's top decision-makers – the Governing Body and the Director-General – I must say that I feel an irresistible urge to kindly but firmly ask you not to proceed further down this road. There are two really serious dangers. The first is that the quality of the instruments being drafted is at risk. The Office and Committee members lack the proper time for thorough consideration of texts and proposed solutions.

Indeed, the ILO's reputation is at stake as far as the quality of its instruments is concerned when we must come to conclusions within unreasonable time-limits. The second danger I see has to do with unduly large pressure which the new timetable exerts on everyone taking part in the discussions, the recording, the drawing up of the report and the translations which are, as we all know, essential.

In concluding, I would like to strongly emphasize that we should refuse to make exceptions to the provisions of our instruments on working time and on forced labour especially for the ILO's headquarters in Geneva, of all places in the world.

Ms. O'DONOVAN (Workers' delegate, Ireland) – Taking the theme of the Director-General's Report to this session of the International Labour Conference, Defending values, promoting change, the proposed Convention and Recommendation on part-time work provide this Conference and the ILO with a timely and valuable opportunity to translate these high words into meaningful action. The proposed Convention and Recommendation have been prepared with a view to addressing this twin objective and I believe that this difficult task has been achieved in the carefully balanced and realistic text which is before the Conference today.

One of the most fundamental changes which has taken place in the labour market over the last 15 to 20 years has been the widespread growth of part-time employment. In our discussions in the tripartite Committee, there was an acceptance and recognition that part-time workers constitute a significant proportion of the workforce in many countries and that this is set to continue and to grow in the future. It was also accepted that this change in the pattern of employment reflects the changing needs of both employers and workers. The reorganization of work, the impact of technology, the growth in the services sector and the introduction of new methods of production have created a greater demand on the part of employers for part-time workers.

On the other hand, many workers, particularly women workers, have opted for part-time work to enable them to combine paid employment with family responsibility. However, there is also a significant proportion of part-time workers who are forced into part-time employment because of the lack of full-time employment opportunities. This combination of circumstances and needs has given rise to the significant part-time workforce in many of our countries today.

The challenge now is to integrate this part-time workforce into the mainstream of the labour force and to guarantee them certain minimum rights and conditions. This is the primary objective of the proposed Convention and Recommendation before this Conference. The values which the proposed Convention and Recommendation seek to defend are the values of fairness, equity and equality. The terms used in the text of the Convention and Recommendation are terms such as "equitable treatment", "the same protection" and "equivalent conditions". These terms surely cannot be categorized as extreme or alien concepts in this forum. Are these not the fundamental values which underlie the work of the ILO as it seeks to improve the working conditions of workers throughout the world, particularly those who are most vulnerable?

The proposed Convention and Recommendation seek to extend to part-time workers basic trade union and employment rights which are already guaranteed to comparable full-time workers under a range of existing ILO instruments. These include such basic rights as the right to organize, to bargain collectively, to proper health and safety protection and the right not to be discriminated against in employment.

It seems to me that the question which should be before this Conference today is not whether or not part-time workers should have these basic rights but rather why it has taken us so long to get to this point. And I suggest that part of the answer to that question is the fact that part-time workers remain on the fringes of the labour market and also that the vast majority of these part-time workers are women who have difficulty having their voice heard and having their needs identified and recognized. A typical part-time worker in any of our countries is probably a woman with family responsibilities, engaged in semi-skilled or low-skilled employment, with minimum rates of pay, excluded from occupational benefits such as pension and sick pay, with access to very limited social security benefits and with no training and promotional opportunities.

But the proposed Convention and Recommendation are not only relevant to those countries which provide little or no protection to part-time workers. The proposed Recommendation in particular contains a very useful elaboration and development of the basic rights contained in the proposed Convention which could be used by countries which already have some minimum protection for part-time workers. These countries, which include my own country, the Republic of Ireland, should use the provisions of the proposed Recommendation to enhance their own legislation and use the detailed guidelines set down in the proposed Recommendation to move forward in providing protection for part-time workers.

In the absence of the kind of fundamental protection contained in the proposed Convention and Recommendation before this Conference, the majority of part-time workers are lost in a twilight zone on the periphery of the labour market. They are employees without basic rights and entitlements. They have to be available to employers as and when required and they are usually squeezed out of statutory social security systems.

The proposed Convention and Recommendation seek to change this and to give part-time workers the right to work with dignity alongside their full-time colleagues. On this the 75th anniversary of the ILO, this is surely a modest aspiration on their part.

Original German: Mr. WILLERS (Government adviser, Germany) – I hope the statement that I am about to make will not sound too academical. On behalf of the federal Government I welcome the report of the Committee on Part-Time Work and congratulate the members of the Committee on the successful conclusion of their discussions. In the same way as previous speakers, I should also like to emphasize the decisive role played by the Committee Chairperson, Mr. M. Rood, and the two Vice-Chairpersons, Ms. I. Van Den Burg for the Workers and Mr. B. Noakes for the Employers, in achieving these results and also in conducting the discussions with care, a spirit of compromise and expert knowledge.

I should also like to express my gratitude to the team of the International Labour Office under the expert guidance of Mr. Dumont and also the Reporter Mrs. L. Samuel, whose excellent report has made it so much easier for me to understand what I am talking about here.

I am convinced that the results achieved in the discussions will contribute considerably towards ensuring that part-time work is considered at its true value in social and labour market policy in the member States of the International Labour Organization. This must be based on the principles of free choice, both on the worker and the employer side, and also on the protection against discrimination and social protection.

Many today prefer part-time work because it is only in this way that they can fulfil themselves at work whilst pursuing private goals and family responsibilities. Above and beyond that, part-time work can make a contribution to reducing unemployment via a better distribution of available work. This point of view is becoming increasingly widespread because in the longer term and worldwide it will not be possible to attain the goal of full employment. In countries with a particularly high level of unemployment, part-time work often provides the only opportunity to escape, at least partially, the fate of unemployment.

Now whatever the reasons are for which workers opt in favour of part-time work, social justice decrees that part-time workers must be protected from discrimination. Only if legal minimum standards exist in the fields of labour law and social protection will it be possible to make part-time work acceptable as an equitable form of work, both on the worker and on the employer side. Since part-time work is engaged in, above all, by women, giving part-time workers an equal access to minimum rights also contributes to greater equality of men and women at work.

I consequently welcome the fact that for these reasons the Committee succeeded in approving minimum legal standards on the basis of a broad consensus. Admittedly the federal Government would have preferred Article 8 of the proposed Convention, which refers to the national social security systems, to have been drafted in a more flexible manner. The Federal Republic of Germany has an elaborate social security system with very broad social benefits. One-third of the gross domestic product is allocated to social expenditure under our social budget. But these comprehensive social security systems can only remain functional if they are protected from abuse and if precisely defined legal criteria are set for social benefit entitlements.

And this is why, in Germany, we have thresholds in the social insurance field linked to the monthly wage levels and the length of the working week. These preclude, for various objectively justifiable reasons, a share of part-time workers from the relevant social insurance scheme. What I should stress is that these workers have no specific social protection by virtue of their part-time work, but they are almost without exception insured in other ways for sickness, invalidity and other situations.

In this context the federal Government takes note of the statement of the ILO's Legal Advisor, Mr. Maupain, made in the Committee on Part-Time Work and my Government can agree with this. In paragraph 133 of the report, the Legal Adviser explains that Article 8 contains not only quantitative but also qualitative criteria, by virtue of the word "unduly" appearing before the words "large percentage". Accordingly a State that has ratified the Convention can exclude a relatively high percentage of part-time workers from the social security system if relevant grounds for so doing exist in their national system. Consequently the word "unduly" must be translated by the word "unangemessen" in the German version and not by the word "übermässig", which has hitherto been used in the texts provided by the Office.

In the light of this explanation the federal Government will be examining whether the objections to Article 8 of the proposed Convention can be withdrawn on the basis of this interpretation of that provision; and in order to ensure that there is no misunderstanding I can say that the German Government representatives at the Conference will be voting in favour of the proposed Convention.

Mr. MOORHEAD (Employers' delegate, United States) – Something happens when we get involved in a technical discussion at the ILO. Instead of an inquiry into the need for a standard in a given area we become enmeshed in the process of producing a Convention and Recommendation. Presumably, the less it says the more ratifiable it is supposed to be.

With regard to part-time work, I have certainly not seen an overriding consensus on what evils needed to be addressed by a protective standard. The closest I have come to finding one is a statement by a representative of the Office in last year's discussion when he stated that "we are trying to place part-time workers on the same footing as full-time workers in respect of benefits". So we have a proposed Convention, much of it based upon European notions of national collective bargaining, that is supposed to apply to the whole world and cover part-time work.

Where are the studies that demonstrate the need for a protective standard? One study by the European Foundation for the Improvement of Living and Working Conditions, published last year on the Economic and Social Dimension of Part-time Work in the European Community, and covering eight member States of the European Union, resulted from a survey of managers and employee representatives. In most cases the employee representatives are members of unions. This is important because it is the employee representative bodies that usually negotiate with employers on the introduction of part-time work. Separate conclusions were noted, and some of those of the employee representatives are worth noting, and I quote: "In most cases part-time workers have no disadvantages in comparison with full-time workers. Part-time work has positive effects upon the labour market and increases employment opportunities for women. Part-time work does affect the working conditions of full-time workers, but the advantages (reduction of overtime and greater job security – which on the other hand means less job security for part-time workers) outweigh the disadvantages (pressure to increase productivity, a lack of solidarity in the fight for better working conditions)".

These are the views of the workers surveyed. Last December the Commission of the European Communities published a White Paper entitled Growth, Competitiveness, Employment. In that paper the Commission called for structural changes in the labour market and regulations limiting the expansion of certain sectors such as services. As we know, the services sector makes heavy use of part-time workers. This, the Commission felt, would make it easier to employ people and increase job growth. In the same paper, the Commission called for the "regulatory framework" to become "more enterprise-friendly".

The response of the ILO to this paper, as reflected by the work of the Part-Time Work Committee, is to propose a Convention and Recommendation which seeks to make part-time work more costly. The EC White Paper notes that social protection schemes have had a negative impact upon employment, and have been barriers to the employment of new entrants to the labour market. None the less, the Conference is now considering a part-time work Convention that does the opposite. It seeks to require the adaptation of statutory social security schemes, so that part-time workers enjoy equivalent conditions comparable to full-time workers.

Significantly, while we were meeting this year, the Finance Ministers of the European Union agreed to create an expert panel to root out bureaucratic barriers to jobs and to examine national regulations that impede job creation. Our response to this decision by the Finance Ministers is to propose a Convention and Recommendation regulating part-time work.

Again, while we were meeting this year, the OECD released a jobs study that called for the reduction and removal of provisions in the structure of tax and social security contributions that discourage hiring or part-time employment. Our response to this call is to propose a Convention and Recommendation regulating part-time work.

We should have been guided in our work by the Director-General's Report, from which I quote, "Whenever a Convention cannot be made ratifiable without first watering down the standards it sets, it would seem preferable to adopt instead a fully autonomous, clear, precise and detailed Recommendation, which might guide member States along their path to fuller development." I continue to quote, "The Conference should ... perhaps reconsider the practice of almost systematically adopting a Convention and Recommendation on the same subject."

Given how little is known about the nature of part-time work, the different stages of part-time work development in each country and the various forms into which it is constantly changing, this would have been good advice to take. Indeed, the Employers' group would have willingly supported such a Recommendation. Instead our Committee chose to propose a new regulation.

Last year I appealed particularly to developing countries to participate in the part-time work discussion and to examine the consequences of the regulation of part-time work on job-creation and economic development. I invite you again to consider the consequences.

Not one job will be created by the proposed standard. Indeed, because of restrictions it is likely to retard the development of part-time work and job-creation. Therefore, my delegation will oppose the adoption of the proposed Convention.

Mr. SANDRASEKARA (Workers' adviser, Sri Lanka) – I think I will accept the invitation extended by the previous speaker for a representative of a developing country to state what we feel about the proposed Convention and Recommendation concerning part-time work. Now, my country Sri Lanka is accelerating its efforts with a view to attaining industrialized status by the year 2000. At the same time, the whole global community is caught up in economic liberalization policies, deregulation policies, open economic strategies and a whole host of things that at one stage were considered well demarcated within industrially developed countries.

Now the situation has changed. It is changing, it will continue to change, and we do not wish to be left behind in the overall development process. Listening to the two discussions that I attended last year and this year, I find that there are specific provisions in some but not all industrially developed countries to protect the interests of part-time workers. But in our country, although there is some form of part-time work it is not structured. The safeguards available in the industrially developed countries are not available in our countries because we did not see this as a problem at that point of time. Now, with the globalization of the economy catching up with all of us, we have begun to think that part-time work will also trickle down as a part of our mainstream economic structure. Therefore, we believe that international guidelines that could be enforced by local legislation should be put in place to provide some sort of protection for part-time work.

I would like to highlight the fact that from available evidence part-time workers are mostly women workers. Today, the world led by the ILO is giving greater and greater emphasis to the need to provide equality to women workers, to give them more protection because it has been found that if some workers are to be sidelined it will be the women workers.

So taking account of all these factors, we believe, coming as we do from a developing country, that a Convention and Recommendation for part-time workers is necessary and we support this totally, unequivocally and clearly, and my appeal to the Conference is to give its full support to the adoption of these two instruments.

Mr. GRAHAM (Workers' adviser, South Africa) – South Africa, from whence I come, is a land of many contrasts. Not least of these is that the country is founded upon an economy that is predominantly a developing one; but there exists simultaneously a highly sophisticated and advanced developed-economy component. I therefore believe we speak from a rather unique position, and it is within that context that I wish to make several observations.

We come to this Conference likewise in a somewhat unique position. South Africa was a founder member of the ILO; however, because of the abhorrent system of apartheid, we were as a nation excluded from full participation and from playing an active role in all facets of this Organization for many years.

Our view is therefore seen from the perspective of one who has looked at the tapestry from afar, and has sometimes seen parts of it very close. Yet as we walk towards it, we observe the richness of the fabric, the intricacy of the stitch and the delicacy of the weave.

We South Africans tend to look upon things with an analytical and somewhat critical eye. We are straightforward and to the point. I would now like to address the report at hand. I would like to address three issues in dealing with that report.

First, much has been said both in the Committee on Part-Time Work, and even here, about the effect that the proposed Convention and Recommendation in the report of the Committee on Part-Time Work, that you have before you, will have on: the way we work; the profitability of institutions and enterprises; and national economies as a whole.

In attempting to address this matter, let us adopt a candid analysis of the instruments before you. Let us address the question of what those instruments really do or, perhaps more importantly, do not do. The thrust of the instruments, I submit, is to say that part-time workers, in appropriate circumstances, must be treated no less favourably than their comparable full-time counterparts. No less and no more. The mere fact that some workers work less hours than others is in itself no ground for lesser treatment – no ground for exploitation.

How does the proposed Convention achieve this laudable goal? It does so through words such as: "the same protection", when dealing with fundamental rights in article 4; it does so through "measures appropriate" in article 5; "in proportion" in article 6; "conditions equivalent" in article 7, and so on and so on.

Hardly the words of rigidity, inflexibility and overregulation. The proposed Convention instead enshrines the words of reason. We have gone through a long process to achieve that – the words of equity, the words of fairness and of justice. The aim is to surely eradicate injustice, exploitation and, what I would term, economic discrimination based merely upon the hours one works.

The proposed Convention is not without checks and balances that I believe will satisfy even the most ardent critics. There are words such as "where appropriate" – a phrase over which we had much debate; and the concept of thresholds. These are the protections built into the proposed Convention to address even its most ardent critics. These, we believe, are defensible arguments – dare I say it – unassailable arguments. Read the report and you will see that there are no in-depth cogent lines of reasoning raised to substantiate that part-timers do not deserve to be collectively bargained for, represented, organized, and the like. There are no convincing arguments why they should not receive occupational health and safety benefits, equivalent maternity protection, annual leave, and even sick leave. There are no cogent arguments, there is no convincing line of reasoning, I submit, why they should not be treated on a full and equitable basis with their comparable full-time counterparts. No cogent arguments were presented to show why this proposed Convention and Recommendation impedes further job creation in any way.

We have had the phrases bandied about, and this is where it has ended. I put it to you, on behalf of the South African labour movement, that flexibility does not mean exploitation, that flexibility cannot mean exploitation, and that it should not ever be allowed to equal exploitation. Heaven knows we have seen enough exploitation in our country. We want to see it disappear on all fronts.

Now, if you accept that proposition, then there is no reason to oppose this report. There is no reason to oppose this proposed Convention and Recommendation.

Second, let us have a look at the process, for I believe the process is a vital indicator of what actually occurred during the Committee discussions. One thing that immediately springs to mind is that the process that was followed in this Committee measures and compares extremely well against that followed in my own country to achieve our own settlement. In both cases, a set of radically differing views and propositions were reconciled into a realistic and positive compromise. No one was the winner, but no one was the loser either.

Like in our country, there are those that fear the settlement – the political settlement in South Africa, the Convention contained here. There are those that predict doom and gloom. I venture to suggest that history will prove all to be misguided and wrong.

Third, as several of my colleagues have alluded, the instruments are particularly pertinent in addressing the issue of disparity of working conditions between men and women. That is not a western phenomenon. It is not a developing country phenomenon. It is not only a developed country phenomenon. It exists throughout the world. In my country, many working women who are part-time workers are the single breadwinners of an entire household. The gender issue is extremely important to us, and it would be a sad day indeed were the exploitation of women workers allowed to continue, especially under the guise of their being called "part-time" employees. It is noteworthy too that there was much active participation during the Committee from the many women delegates. It was particularly so on the Government benches, and particularly so on the Workers' benches. This is, I submit, a further indication of the relevance and importance of this issue for women. So it is all those women that I salute, and that I urge you to salute, by adopting the proposed Convention and the Recommendation. In South Africa there is a well-known political saying which when translated into English means "power to the people". Perhaps just this once it should be "power to the women".

With these three points in mind, I have no hesitation on behalf of the South African labour movement, in unreservedly urging you all to support and to adopt the report, and to adopt the proposed Convention and the Recommendation. And I urge governments to ratify it.

Mr. STEYNE (Workers' adviser, United Kingdom) – Last year, I had the honour to be the very last speaker from the floor of the Conference. This year, I almost repeat that feat. I am one of the last of the trade union representatives to congratulate the President on his election at this session of the Conference. As one of the newest regular Workers at the ILO, it was good to know while we were interned in room 17 and sometimes I doubted if we would ever be allowed out that the Conference in this 75th year of the ILO was safely and properly in the hands of a worker and one who is amongst the most experienced in the ILO system.

Let me turn now to the report of the Committee on Part-Time Work. It is my honour, on behalf of the seven and a half million trade unionists represented by the Trades Union Congress in Britain, to support the adoption of the report. I should like to echo the comments of Professor Rood and of my trade union colleagues who have spoken before me. But I have to say, following Brother Graham's tour de force will be a hard task. I should like to make a few brief additional points. The Convention we have drafted recognizes the economic importance of part-time work. But, while it also recognizes that part-time work may, and I underline may, create additional employment opportunities, it in no way suggests or supports the replacement of full-time jobs with part-time employment.

Secretary Reich of the United States, in his speech to the high-level meeting on employment, noted that flexibility in hiring and firing had never led to higher standards of living. It is obvious to state that replacement of full-time jobs with part-time jobs may be of great benefit to employers, linked as it is to increased flexibility, productivity, and profitability; but the associated reduction in the income of families, who may depend, as Brother Graham said, solely on the one part-time income, can only compress demand in the market, and often excludes those workers and their families from participation as consumers of all but the basic necessities.

There are few industrialized countries with high-wage economies, where working people may be able to afford to choose part-time work freely, perhaps in order to pursue further education or to spend more time with their children. Those countries are few and far between. In my country, the United Kingdom, part-time work is largely associated with low pay. Five million workers, a quarter of the employed population, work part time. Ninety per cent of them are women. Only 11 per cent work in professional employment. These low-paid women workers cannot choose part-time work freely. Those with child-care responsibilities, and I hasten to add that my country still has far to go in equalizing those responsibilities between women and men, often have little choice because of the lack of affordable child-care facilities. This is indicated by the following figures: in 1990, 44 per cent of working women in Britain worked part time, compared with only 8 per cent of men. Of course, in some sectors, there simply is no full-time work available, as employers replace full-time workers with cheaper, more flexible part-timers. Here, the possibility of identifying comparable full-time workers with similar occupations in the same branch of activity, as laid down in the proposed Convention, is of central importance.

Part-time work is one of the most widespread forms of atypical employment relationship throughout the world. Most part-time workers, as I have said, are women. They deserve protection. The instruments we have placed before the Conference are flexible. They enshrine basic rights, central to the ILO as an entity, central basic rights of freedom of association, health and safety at work, and protection against discrimination in employment. They insist that part-time workers should enjoy the same pay, calculated proportionately, as comparable full-time workers. They provide for equal maternity protection for part-time working women. In response to the distinguished Employers' delegate from the United States, I would remind the Conference of Paragraph 16 of the Recommendation, which specifically calls for the adaptation of statutory social security schemes which discourage recourse to, or acceptance of, part-time work. But the instruments also allow for proportionality in a wide range of conditions, and also for some exclusions based on thresholds. We welcome the provision that those thresholds should be progressively reduced, and that they should be the subject of tripartite consultation.

In March this year, the House of Lords, the supreme court of the British judicial system, decided that thresholds that excluded a great many part-time workers from protection against unfair dismissal and from protective redundancy provisions were illegal because they amounted to indirect sex discrimination.

The TUC believes that that judgement will be extrapolated to other areas of discrimination against part-time workers. Last year, I referred, in my speech to the plenary on the adoption of last year's report of our Committee, to the abysmal record of ratification of my Government since 1979. I hope sincerely that the far less obdurate conduct of my Government in the deliberations of the Committee this year, following the House of Lords' judgement, will be reflected in a decision by our Government to support the adoption of this Convention on Part-Time Work, and in a decision to ratify the Convention and accept the Recommendation.

I have referred to part-time work as one of the most widespread forms of atypical employment relationship. Next year we will begin discussion of another – homeworking, an area in which, again, primarily women workers desperately require protection. It would have been most appropriate if, in this 75th anniversary year of the ILO, we had commenced, with the Convention before you today, a body of instruments to protect the most vulnerable and most exploited workers in the world. I would draw your attention to the identification by the Committee of Experts of contract labour as a major contributory factor to the extent of child labour in Thailand. It is therefore a source of even greater regret to the Trade Union Congress that the proposal of the Workers' group of the Governing Body to begin discussion in 1996 of a new instrument on contract labour was not accepted by Employers and many Governments on the Governing Body.

We hope that contract labour will be on our agenda here before we celebrate the 80th anniversary of the ILO.

With that concluding remark, which is intended to remind the Conference that the central role of the ILO is to protect working people, and that it should continue to fulfil that role for the elaboration of new and relevant international labour standards, it is my great pleasure to commend the report of the Part-Time Work Committee to the Conference. In doing so, I should like to add my voice to the appreciation already expressed for the excellent work of our Chairperson, Professor Rood and Mr. Dumont of the Office and his staff, Mrs. Samuels, our Rapporteur, of the Workers' and Employers' Vice-Chairpersons and to all my trade union colleagues for the long hours of hard work we have shared together over the past two years.

Original French: Mr. TOURE (Employers' adviser, Mali) – I am speaking to this assembly on behalf of the African employers in order to emphasize some of the particularities of our situation with respect to part-time work.

The question of part-time work which is being considered today is of definite interest, to workers and employers alike. It offers opportunities for the organization of working time for certain categories of workers.

Nevertheless, part-time work is a new concept for many developing countries. In mine, Mali, it was introduced in the legislation only in 1992. This is certainly not the case for industrialized countries which have been practising it for a number of years now already.

Some African employers wonder whether we should lay down regulations for part-time work in an international instrument such as a Convention. Our answer was no, because to adopt a Convention and to encourage our countries to ratify it means, for developing countries and in particular for the African countries, taking a short-cut to put them on the same level as industrialized countries. This is something we would not wish to do. We have tried to do it in other areas, and today we are continuing to pay the price for the consequences of this thoughtless action.

We agree to change and we agree to develop, but we want to do so at a rate that we can stand.

Neither the people nor the mentalities of our countries are ready to understand and adjust the system of part-time work to the countries' circumstances. Both national administrations and enterprises need to be restructured if a part-time work system is to be put into practice.

If we read the definition of part-time work that is given in the Convention, we realize that it is practically impossible for it to be understood by an African employer.

In our countries, definitions are one or two sentences long, with one or two commas, whereas in the proposed Convention the definition took four paragraphs and three subparagraphs. This is simply to explain to you the mentality of African employers so far.

For all these reasons, we wanted to have an instrument whose provisions we could adjust in the light of circumstances rather than a Convention that would impose almost insurmountable constraints on us.

Therefore, we have fears about the adoption of a Convention supplemented by a Recommendation. We can say frankly that we have reservations and even a certain amount of reluctance.

Apart from these few comments, we have nothing against the adoption of the report submitted to us.

Original French: Mr. WOOLFORD (Employers' delegate, Canada) – During the last few years and even at this Conference, the Members of the International Labour Office have been examining and discussing amongst themselves the role and work of the Organization and considering the possibilities for reform. If Members want a demonstration of the need for a reform process, they can find it in the Convention and Recommendation on part-time work.

(The speaker continues in English.)

All around the world countries are grappling with the challenge of finding work for their people. In my own country, in Canada, we are now in our third year of recovery and expansion since the recession of 1991 and yet unemployment is still around 10.5 per cent. In some European countries the unemployment rate is above Canada's, an absolutely unheard of circumstance. The rate for France is over 12 per cent. Employers' delegates like Mr. Touré from Third World nations spoke eloquently in our Employers' meetings about the pressing need in their countries to find work for their people. This problem is recognized by the ILO itself. Ministers held a special session here in the early days of our Conference. The leaders of this very group got together to consider what should be done about unemployment. I wish they had taken a few minutes in order to visit the Committee on Part-Time Work. I think, no I hope, they would have been shocked to discover what we were doing.

(The speaker continues in French.)

We need job creation. Part-time work is a growing phenomenon. In other words, we are seeing the creation of thousands of jobs and that is the main objective of all governments represented at this meeting.

And what is the response of the ILO? We set up a committee in order to propose how our member States should regulate and control this source of new job opportunities.

(The speaker continues in English.)

This is economically unwise and against the best interests of those millions of unemployed people in our countries. We now know that regulations are generally anti-employment. They raise the cost of hiring a person. They are likely to reduce the wages that he or she can be paid, and they constrain the flexibility with which individuals and firms can respond to changing circumstances. It is hard to understand why the ILO would take such a step.

There are a few other considerations Members should bear in mind as they approach the vote on these instruments. The service sectors are the sectors in which most new First World jobs are being created, both part-time and full-time. By their nature these sectors are heavily reliant on part-time work. I wonder if there are any delegates here today who plan to eat their meals at the Conference between the hours of 9 and 5.

Secondly, part-time jobs are very important to groups that are of particular concern to the ILO, that is, as several speakers have mentioned, women and young people. And yet the proposed Convention and the Recommendation could easily make it more costly for employers to hire these people in countries that bring additional regulation or legislation into place in order to comply with the ILO instruments. Many Employers' representatives from the Third World in our Employers' group noted that the proposed instruments are simply irrelevant to the realities that they face in their economies, and I think Mr. Touré made that point very tellingly just before me.

Finally, as speakers from governments and the Workers' and Employers' groups variously noted over the course of our Committee's work, part-time workers are already covered by many ILO instruments. For these reasons, on behalf of Canadian Employers, I cannot support the proposed Convention and Recommendation. I would urge others who share my concerns not to do so either.

Original Spanish: Mr. DE ARBELOA (Employers' adviser, Venezuela) – First of all, I would like to congratulate the President on having being elected to preside over this 81st Session of the International Labour Conference, which commemorates the 75th anniversary of our Organization. I should also like to extend my greetings to his "family" of trade unions. As we know, they have been involved for many years in labour causes in the United States and the world and campaigned for democracy and trade union pluralism in Latin America.

I should just like to take a few minutes to explain the reasons why we have decided to vote "no" to this Convention. Venezuela is a developing country which is trying to overcome a very critical economic and social situation. Nevertheless it has ratified considerably more Conventions than the overwhelming majority of developed countries.

In this context, we, in the Venezuelan Federation of Chambers and Associations of Commerce and Production (FEDECAMARAS) are particularly concerned that on the grounds that there is a lack of machinery for tripartite discussion in our country, we have had to submit a complaint to the ILO with the support of the International Employers' Organization, because we believe that our labour legislation violates a number of these Conventions.

Furthermore, as was noted by the Committee on the Application of Standards and in accordance with the reports of experts our Government is in the process of dealing with a series of questions in relation to this complaint and other cases of failure to implement standards. As the President of FEDECAMARAS, Mr. Romero Nava, said in his statement to the plenary, we are confident that the new Government of Venezuela, which is headed by an illustrious compatriot, will, in the near future, take the necessary measures to compensate for or resolve these aspects to which I have referred.

Given our present situation, it is essential to promote conditions that will stimulate national and international investment for the creation of productive employment, contribute to the elimination of poverty and improve the low standards of living of the overwhelming majority of Venezuelans. Finally, the employers of our country, a developing country, believe that present circumstances require more opportunities for employment, above all for young people, older people and those of low skill levels so that they might have better access to the labour market.

We therefore feel that the time is not ripe to place – either directly or indirectly – further obstacles to the creation of productive employment, whether this takes the form of full-time, or in this case, part-time jobs. For these reasons, the delegation of the Venezuelan employers feels that it is bound to err on the side of caution with respect to the adoption of any new standards or Conventions which would stand in the way of overcoming the critical problems of unemployment and underemployment – which does not facilitate the necessary economic integration of our country.

Therefore, we must once again state that we do not agree with and we shall vote against this proposed Convention.

Mr. JONATHAN (Workers' delegate, Lesotho) – The Lesotho workers join me in extending their heartiest congratulations to the President and his Officers on their unanimous election at this session of the International Labour Conference. I wish to echo the feelings that have already been eloquently expressed by the distinguished delegates who spoke before me.

On behalf of the Lesotho workers, I would like to express my full support for the report of the Committee on Part-Time Work and the proposed Convention and Recommendation concerning part-time work, annexed to the report. I very much hope that the Conference will adopt the report as well as the Convention and Recommendation. The words contained in the proposed Convention and Recommendation have taken us two years of hard work and overall we have achieved a good result. I would therefore like to congratulate the Chairperson of the Committee, Mr. Rood of the Netherlands, and also the Employer and Worker Vice-Chairpersons, Mr. Noakes and Mrs. Van Den Burg, for their work, especially in steering this Committee to the stage we have reached.

At a time when we are celebrating the ILO's diamond jubilee, it is important to reflect not only on the ILO's past achievements. Impressive though they may be, it is just as important to look at the situation with regard to the overall labour market and see what changes have taken place over the years. In my view, the phenomenon of part-time work has in many parts of the world become very important. What is more, it is not restricted to workers who simply want to occasionally want to supplement family incomes when it is convenient, but also to workers whose livelihood depends on the earnings they receive as part-time workers. This is an area where workers remain unprotected. I am thinking here of professional men and women who for a variety of reasons have to work on a part-time basis. In some cases this is due to family responsibilities and in others it can be because of physical disabilities. I am therefore happy to see that in article 7 of the proposed Convention some basic rights are covered.

The issues of termination of employment, maternity protection, paid annual leave and sick leave cannot be said to be anything but very basic conditions of employment. A lot of part-time workers, especially those working at home with machines, get injured, but they are often not covered adequately by legislation. I am therefore pleased to see that the proposed Convention mentioned this important area.

In the part of the world where I come from, I see that a lot of female teachers and farm workers, especially in the case of the latter, work on a part-time basis during peak periods. In the case of farm workers, this phenomenon is linked with seasonal work. The right of these workers to seek employment is very important.

I am therefore happy to express my fullest support to the request of Mrs. Van Den Burg, Vice-Chairperson of the Committee, that the report, the proposed Convention and the proposed Recommendation be adopted by this Conference. Such a decision by the Conference will signal an important development in the extension of the basic conditions of employment of part-time workers.

Mr. SIMANJUNTAK (Government adviser, Indonesia) – My delegation supports the view of the Committee that part-time employment has been of particular significance for both developed and developing countries. It is very important not only when unemployment continues to be a major social and political problem, but also when industrial capacity to absorb an ever-increasing labour force is limited. In many developed countries, the existence of part-time work may be due to greater freedom of choice of workers and flexibility of working time arrangements. It creates greater opportunities for employers to react to the demands of new technologies and for households to reconcile professional and family aspirations.

In many developing countries part-time work appears as the only choice for the labour force because there is not enough full-time employment available. In my country, Indonesia, the rate of unemployment is rather low, about 2.5 per cent, but the rate of underemployment in terms of working hours is quite high, over 30 per cent. In our work definition, those who are working less than 35 hours per week are categorized as underemployed. They can also be categorized as part-time workers in terms of working hours and their low level of productivity. They have to accept such conditions because full-time productive employment is not enough for the whole labour force.

In such conditions, my Government is concerned with three objectives. First, to create about 2.5 million new jobs every year, including part-time employment. Second, to increase the productivity of underemployed workers. Third, to improve protection for part-time workers or for underemployed workers.

My Government must strike a balance among the three employment objectives. My Government realizes that over-protection of part-time work may not only hinder new employment creation but also reduce existing employment.

Therefore, the application of standards to protect part-time workers should not be counter-productive in preventing the creation of new employment opportunities. Moreover, the application of such standards should be aimed at increasing the productivity and improving the working conditions of part-time workers without any reference to trade, domestically or internationally.

The PRESIDENT – We will now proceed with the adoption of the report itself, paragraphs 1 to 270.

May I take it that the report is adopted?

PROPOSED CONVENTION CONCERNING PART-TIME WORK: ADOPTION

The PRESIDENT – We now proceed to the adoption of the proposed Convention concerning part-time work. I submit the Preamble for adoption.

(The Preamble is adopted.)

The PRESIDENT – We now proceed to adopt the proposed Convention, Article by Article.

(Articles 1 to 11 are adopted seriatim.)

The PRESIDENT – In the light of the comments made, of which due note has been taken, may I take it that the proposed Convention as a whole is adopted?

(The proposed Convention is adopted as a whole.)

The PRESIDENT – In accordance with article 40, paragraph 7, of the Standing Orders of the Conference, the proposed Convention concerning part-time work will be submitted to the Drafting Committee of the Conference for the preparation of the final text.

PROPOSED RECOMMENDATION CONCERNING PART-TIME WORK: ADOPTION

The PRESIDENT – We now move on to the adoption of the proposed Recommendation concerning part-time work. I submit the Preamble for adoption.

(The Preamble is adopted.)

The PRESIDENT – We now proceed to adopt the proposed Recommendation, Paragraph by Paragraph.

(Paragraphs 1 to 22 are adopted seriatim.)

The PRESIDENT – In the light of the comments made, of which due note has been taken, may I take it that the proposed Recommendation as a whole is adopted?

(The proposed Recommendation is adopted as a whole.)

The PRESIDENT – In accordance with paragraph 7 of article 40 of the Standing Orders of the Conference, the proposed Recommendation concerning part-time work will be submitted to the Drafting Committee of the Conference for the preparation of the final text.

We have now completed the consideration of the report, as well as the proposed Convention and Recommendation submitted by the Committee on Part-time Work. I certainly want to express my gratitude to the Chairperson, the Vice-Chairpersons, the Reporter, the members of the Committee and the staff of the secretariat for the excellent work they have done.

(The Conference adjourned at 5.15 p.m.)

FINAL RECORD VOTE ON THE CONVENTION CONCERNING PART-TIME WORK

The PRESIDENT – The first item on our agenda is the final record vote on the Convention concerning part-time work, the text of which can be in Provisional Record No. 23A.

I give the floor to the Clerk of the Conference.

Original French: The CLERK OF THE CONFERENCE – Throughout the Conference and last week in particular you have had the opportunity to carry out test votes, using the little machine before you on your table, and to check whether your badge works and is properly coded.

The procedure for the vote that is about to be held is very simple. As you have seen in the Daily Bulletin, we are going to open a vote during the first hour of this sitting. This means that all delegates will have the opportunity to vote during that hour on the Convention concerning Part-Time Work, whether they are in the room now or arrive later, following which that vote will be closed and the vote on the Recommendation will be opened.

The instructions are very clearly indicated on your voting station. You insert the badge and a message appears telling you exactly what to do; you are asked a question and you answer "yes", "no" or "abstention", making sure to confirm your vote by pressing the "valid" button twice. If your vote is not confirmed by the "valid" button, it will not be registered. When you withdraw your badge, you will hear a "beep" if your vote has not been recorded, in which case you must repeat the procedure and confirm your vote. If you have any difficulty, there are people stationed in the room to help you out at any time.

We shall therefore proceed to the vote. As you see, the electronic voting procedure has been initiated and you can begin to vote.

(A record vote is taken.)

(The detailed results of the vote will be found at the end of the record of this sitting.)

The PRESIDENT – The result of the vote on the Convention concerning part-time work is as follows: 258 in favour, 88 against, with 43 abstentions. The quorum is 271. As the required two-thirds majority has been attained, the Convention concerning part-time work is adopted.

(The Convention is adopted.)

FINAL RECORD VOTE ON THE RECOMMENDATION CONCERNING PART-TIME WORK.

The PRESIDENT – We shall now proceed to the final record vote on the Recommendation concerning part-time work, the text of which can be found in Provisional Record No. 23B.

(A record vote is taken.)

The PRESIDENT – The result of the vote on the Recommendation is as follows: 291 in favour, 35 against, with 71 abstentions. The quorum is 271. As the required two-thirds majority has been attained, the Recommendation concerning part-time work is adopted.

(The Recommendation is adopted.)

The PRESIDENT – I have several requests for the floor from delegates who wish to explain their vote.

Original French: Mr. BRANDT (Government adviser, Switzerland) – I would like, in this brief declaration, to explain the attitude of the Government of Switzerland in respect of the vote that has just been taken.

We abstained on the vote on the Convention concerning part-time work. Indeed, one of our social security laws, a federal law on old age, survival and invalidity, does not meet the requirements of Articles 6 and 8 of the Convention.

The differences between the text of the Convention and the above-mentioned legislation are rather important.

According to its policy in the matter of ratifying international labour Conventions, Switzerland could not have ratified this Convention in the near future.

Under Article 4 of the Convention, finally, while there is no legislation on this question in Switzerland, it seems that the application of this provision through collective agreements could also cause serious problems for a specific industrial sector, mainly the Swiss machine tool industry.

Original French: Mr. RAMOND (Government delegate, France) – The French delegation wishes to explain the reasons for its abstention.

Indeed, we would have liked to vote in favour of a good Convention likely to be ratified by a large majority of States. Our legislation induced us to regard the discussion on this Convention to be under particularly favourable auspices. Unfortunately, it appeared that the quality of our national legislation, which allows wage compensation to persons obliged to cease their part-time work, was incompatible with the provisions of Articles 6, 7 and 8 concerning social security.

Our experts tried, through various attempted amendments, to reduce the risks for our country. Not only were they unable to achieve this but, on the initiative of one of the IMEC countries, matters were complicated still further.

So, after a study of the Convention, our technical services informed us that, for the time being, it was impossible for us to ratify it. Were we therefore to adopt the attitude of many delegations who voted in favour of the Convention knowing full well that it will be impossible for them to ratify it?

Their attitude can easily be understood. They consider, indeed, that by voting for a Convention they will not ratify, at least they will not prevent other countries from ratifying it if they so wish. We understand this reasoning, but what will happen if there are not enough ratifications for this Convention to be implemented? Does it contribute to the progress of international law if there are a number of Conventions which are voted but not ratified, as has been the case for the past ten years? Are we in the process of obstinately building a museum of prototypes of international Conventions? We thought that it would be preferable today, for purely political reasons relating to the future of the ILO, to stop this motor which seems to be running in neutral in the interests of the very credibility of the ILO as an institution. This is why my country has abstained.

Mr. AHMED (Workers' delegate, Pakistan) – I want to make a special request. Due to an unavoidable reason I could not vote. I should be very glad if my vote could be taken as affirmative.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON SAFETY AND HEALTH IN MINES: SUBMISSION, DISCUSSION AND ADOPTION

The PRESIDENT – The next item on our agenda is the consideration of the report of the Committee on Safety and Health in Mines.

I have the pleasure of asking Mr. Bekes, Government adviser, Hungary, Chairman of the Committee; Mr. Pirie, Employers' adviser, Canada, Employer Vice-Chairman; Mr. Maitland, Workers' delegate, Australia, Worker Vice-Chairman; and Mr. Thompson, Government adviser, Australia, Reporter of the Committee, to come to the rostrum.

I invite Mr. Thompson to submit the report to the Conference.

Mr. THOMPSON (Government adviser, Australia; Reporter of the Committee on Safety and Health in Mines) – First of all, I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate our President, Mr. Charles Gray, on his election to lead the work of this historic 81st Session of the International Labour Conference.

I say historic for several reasons. Firstly, it coincides with the 75th anniversary of the International Labour Organization. Secondly, it sees the return to this unique international tripartite forum of the Republic of South Africa – one of the world's great mining nations. Thirdly, on the agenda we have the first discussion of safety and health in mines. This item is of paramount importance because mining is regarded as one of the world's most hazardous occupations and is characterized by many unique hazards and constantly changing working environments.

Accordingly, I am both pleased and proud to submit to the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference the report of the Committee on Safety and Health in Mines. The report, which can be found in Provisional Record No. 26, covers the proceedings of the meetings which, on the basis of a first discussion, have led to conclusions proposed with a view to a Convention and a Recommendation.

The report also contains the text of a resolution passed unanimously by the Committee. It calls for the item entitled "Safety and health in mines" to be placed on the agenda of the next session of the Conference in 1995.

Our Committee held 13 meetings over nine days and examined 206 amendments during approximately 38 hours of discussion. Some of these amendments required lengthy deliberations and careful analysis and had far-reaching effects on the final text. I should stress, however, that the discussion in the Committee clearly demonstrated a shared concern for the protection of the safety and health of mineworkers. As a result of this, the Committee was able to arrive at a consensus or an acceptable compromise on the majority of issues.

It must also be stated that our task was somewhat facilitated by the previous work of the ILO, including the Conventions and Recommendations listed in the Preamble to the Proposed Conclusions, as well as by the two most recent ILO codes on safety and health in underground mines and in opencast mines. The two reports produced by the Office and which form the basis of this discussion, namely, Safety and health in mines, Reports V(1) and V(2), were also useful and valuable references.

In regard to the document itself, the first section of the Proposed Conclusions deals with definitions, and the scope and means of application which have been proposed with a view to a Convention. It suggests that the instrument should cover both underground and surface sites where exploration and mineral extraction activities are carried out, and that it should apply to all types of mining enterprises. To provide some flexibility, however, the possibility of excluding certain categories of mines exists, but only after consulting with representative groups of both employers and workers, and only so long as the safety and the health of workers is not compromised. Reference is also made to the progressive covering of the categories of mines which are subject to such exclusion, and to an obligation to report the reasons for the exclusion to the International Labour Office, to ensure scrutiny. This section also requires member States to consult with employers and workers and to formulate, implement and periodically review a coherent national policy on safety and health in mines.

The next section is entitled "General provisions". It specifies provisions in national laws and regulations to ensure implementation, including the designation of the competent authority to monitor and regulate the various aspects of safety and health in mines, procedures for reporting and investigating mine disasters, accidents and dangerous occurrences, and the publication of relevant statistics. We also have included requirements relating to the provision of mine rescue, first aid and appropriate medical facilities, an obligation to provide self-rescue respiratory devices for underground mineworkers, provisions concerning the handling, transport and use of explosives and initiating devices, requirements for the safe storage and disposal of waste and protection measures for abandoned workings. All these will need to be addressed in national laws and regulations.

National laws and regulations will also have to provide for the establishment of procedures to ensure respect for the right of workers to participate and be consulted on safety and health issues and to ensure the rights of the persons selected by workers to represent them in these matters.

Workers will also be assigned several responsibilities in relation to health and safety, as follows: they will have to take reasonable care for their own safety and health and that of others, to comply with prescribed health and safety measures and to report hazards to their supervisors. Workers must, however, be given proper training in regard to these responsibilities if they are to be held accountable.

The next section deals with preventive and protective measures to be taken by the employers at the mine. Here the primary duty of the employers is clearly defined. Is to take all necessary measures to eliminate or minimize the risks to the safety and health of workers in mines. These include technical measures regarding the design, construction, commissioning and decommissioning of mines, measures to monitor and maintain ground stability during mining operations, regular inspection and monitoring of the working environment to identify and assess hazards, developing safe systems of work for areas susceptible to particular hazards such as mine fires, gas and rock outbursts, rock falls and the like, providing two means of exit from underground workplaces, ensuring workers are evacuated in dangerous situations and maintaining adequate standards of ventilation in underground mines.

Employers' duties in relation to workers who are exposed to certain physical, chemical or biological hazards specific to mines are also defined here. Reference is made to the employer's duty to inform workers of these hazards and the associated health risks and to take appropriate measures to eliminate or minimize the risks of exposure, including the provision of appropriate protective equipment at no cost to the workers.

Other duties outlined include the provision of adequate training and supervision, investigating and reporting accidents and dangerous occurrences, developing emergency response plans for industrial and natural disasters and ensuring the provision of regular health surveillance of exposed workers.

The next section, entitled "Implementation", refers to the establishment of inspection services and appropriate penalties and corrective measures to be taken by member States to ensure the effective enforcement and implementation of these provisions.

The Proposed Conclusions with a view to a Recommendation, provide further elaboration and gives guidance concerning the measures to be taken, in accordance with national laws and regulations, to give effect to the provisions of the Convention. Substantial proactive measures to improve the safety and health of workers are also provided and should have a real impact on reducing the incidence of injury and occupational disease in the industry.

Although a large number of amendments placed a heavy burden on our Committee, our deliberations were greatly facilitated by the able guidance and sense of humour of our Chairman, Mr. Bekes. Thanks to him, the final conclusions were accepted in a spirit of cooperation. Our equally able Vice-Chairmen, Mr. Pirie from the Employers' group and Mr. Maitland from the Workers' group, in addition to being professionals, shared a strong sense of concern and responsibility for mineworkers' safety and health. They also showed tolerance for the ideas of others and demonstrated creativity in the development of solutions to key issues.

The other Government delegates and advisers who considered the 206 amendments in the development of this report are also to be commended for their active participation and for the high level of technical expertise demonstrated in their contributions.

In addition, I would like to acknowledge the work of those who served on the drafting committee. They all have earned a special word of thanks.

Last, but not least, I would like to express the gratitude of our Committee for the help and assistance we received from the representatives of the Secretary-General, Dr. Pinnagoda and his team of experts, legal advisers, secretaries and translators, clerks, typists and others. They were all available at all times and responded to our wishes with both humour and efficiency. In my opinion, their hard work and dedication helped bring the activities of our Committee to a very successful conclusion.

I would like to propose inserting one additional paragraph to the report. It should be numbered as paragraph 179, and should read as follows: "The report of the Committee, the proposed Conclusions and the resolution to place on the agenda of the next ordinary session of the Conference an item entitled: Safety and health in mines, are hereby submitted for consideration."

Finally, it gives me great pleasure to submit the report of the Committee on Safety and Health in Mines and the resolution to the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference and to recommend their adoption.

The PRESIDENT – The discussion of the report is now open.

Mr. PIRIE (Employers' adviser, Canada; Vice-Chairman of the Committee on Safety and Health in Mines) – This first discussion has produced proposed conclusions with a view to a Convention and a Recommendation. I wish to take this opportunity to remind everybody that this was just the first discussion. These first discussion results are a long way from being the finished product; there is an enormous amount of work to be done between now and the second discussion in June 1995. There are also a number of contentious issues to be settled during next year's discussions. Let me also remind everyone that the employer community will continue to strive for a Convention based on fundamental principles that will enhance health and safety for the maximum number of workers in mines around the world.

The mining industry is very diverse in its applications and methodologies. No two bodies are identical. No two extraction techniques are the same in terms of application. The health and safety challenges are not identical. Thus, we are committed to producing a Convention based on fundamental principles that can be adapted to the wide variety of situations that exist in the world's mining areas.

Let us also not forget that we, as employers, know who has the primary responsibility for health and safety policy procedures and their implementation. We do not intend to avoid that responsibility – on the contrary we intend to continue to exercise it. The responsibilities contained in the results of this first discussion are important. That is why it is also so important to produce a Convention that can be adapted to the wide variety of conditions, one that is based on sound fundamental principles that can be ratified by the largest number of member States.

We believe widespread ratification is necessary if our finished product, following the second discussion, is to be of benefit to most of the world's workers in mines. Therefore the Convention cannot and must not be loaded down with detail that will work against ratification. That is why, next year, we will continue to remind people that this is to be an instrument for the health and safety of workers in mines; that it is not an instrument to deal with social issues. It is not an instrument to deal with environmental issues. It is an instrument to give direction to those people in the member States who draft national laws and regulations in consultation with the parties concerned. We are not here in Geneva to draft these laws and regulations. Our purpose here is one of direction-giving, based on fundamental principles. Thus, the Convention should not be filled with such details as worker representative activities that take place at the mine site, and which are adapted to local conditions. Details of this nature will work against ratification. Ratification is essential.

Obviously, my preceding comments reflect philosophical differences between ourselves and some of the others involved in this process. Nevertheless, our discussions were conducted in an informative, cooperative and civil manner. Much of the credit for that goes to Mr. Maitland, Worker member and Vice-Chairman. While we obviously have different viewpoints and methods, I sincerely admire and respect his devotion and dedication. Thank you very much Mr. Maitland. The Reporter, Mr. Thompson, and his drafting committee did a wonderful job of sorting out and giving order to the results of our deliberations. They had an especially challenging job with the Recommendation. Thank you very much Mr. Thompson. The secretariat met the challenge of a shortened work schedule and 206 amendments. The report in front of you is evidence that they not only met the challenge but that they met it with flying colours. Thank you Dr. Pinnagoda and all your staff. And finally, Dr. Bekes, our Chairman, was also equal to the challenge. He exercised his leadership with humour, intelligence, wisdom and courage. He certainly was adaptable. My most heartfelt thanks to Mr. Bekes from the employer community. And finally one last reminder. We, as employers, certainly intend to be here next year to exercise our responsibilities.

Mr. MAITLAND (Workers' delegate, Australia; Worker Vice-Chairman of the Committee on Safety and Health in Mines) – I take this opportunity on behalf of all mineworkers, their families and their communities to thank the Governing Body for the decision to place on the agenda of the 81st Session the question of safety and health in mines.

We are particularly proud that the discussions on safety and health in mines are taking place in this historic 75th anniversary year because this year marks the return of the Republic of South Africa to the ILO, a return which is welcome. South Africa is a world leader in mining and a country whose workers can gain much from the development and adoption of instruments on safety and health in mines.

It is also very important because, as recorded in ILO Report V(1), mining continues to be one of the most hazardous, if not the most hazardous, occupation for workers. The industry continues to experience heavy loss of life because of the exposure of mineworkers to the multiple hazards of the working environment unique to mines.

The industry's tragic loss of life which is measured by official statistics to be more than 15,000 per year, and probably unofficially closer to more than double that number, caused by mining diseases and other violent and catastrophic events, creates enormous economic and social upheaval within the community.

The economic importance of mining cannot be overstated. In many countries, it provides national income for medical, welfare, educational and social programmes.

However, mineworkers in many countries continue to be denied basic freedoms. In some countries mining trade unionists carry out their work under constant threat. Therefore, there is a need to protect workers' rights, and address such issues as: the right to freedom of association; the elimination of child labour; and forced labour, the right to collectively bargain; and the right for safety and health at the workplace.

In a world beset by economic problems, ethnic tensions, doubt and uncertainty, a strong instrument on safety and health in mines will not only protect mineworkers faced with specific hazards but it can also demonstrate that the ILO, its member States and participating organizations can continue to take the lead in protecting workers' rights, promoting social and economic justice and developing international labour codes.

The discussion of this Committee has been vital in setting the course for the development of a progressive instrument which will establish the highest degree of protection for workers in a sector which is crucial to industrial development.

I commend the report to the plenary and also take the opportunity to thank the officers and staff of the ILO for the great support which they have given the Committee. I also wish to thank the Workers' delegates and deputies for their dedication and contribution to the work of the Committee. They have served their membership well.

I wish to thank the Workers' Bureau consisting of Mr. Stendalen (Worker member, Sweden), Mr. Mbonini (Worker member, Botswana), Mr. Main (Worker member, United States) and Mr. Padilla (Worker member, Philippines), with a special thanks to our secretary Damian Roland and also particular acknowledgement for the work done by Mr. Benjamin (Worker member), South Africa on our Preparatory Committee. I take this opportunity also to thank the Government and Employer groups for their input and, in particular, the Employers' spokesman, Mr. Pirie (Employer member, Canada), for the manner in which he conducted the negotiations. I also want to thank the Committee Chairman, Dr. Bekes, who at times had to deal with some very difficult situations but handled the job admirably. Finally, I want to thank the Workers' group for electing me to be their spokesperson. This task has been a very great honour for me.

In conclusion, I want to thank the Reporter, Mr. Thompson, and I wish to issue best wishes for a safe journey home to all, and indicate that we are looking forward to continue our work next year.

Mr. BEKES (Government adviser, Hungary; Chairman of the Committee on Safety and Health in Mines) – As Chairman of the Committee on Safety and Health in Mines, and on behalf of all its members I should like to express our appreciation to the Governing Body and to the International Labour Organization for the timely decision to place an item on safety and health in mines on this year's agenda of the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference. As we have already heard, despite the lack of adequate statistics, it is considered that over 1 million miners suffer from occupational injury or disease, and around 15,000 miners are killed at their workplaces each year. In view of this, the first discussion of this important subject has reaffirmed the urgency of preventive action and the key role that the ILO can play in strengthening the efforts of member States in this area. I believe that the Organization has recognized and appreciated the magnitude and complexity of the task of securing the safety and health of miners and the usefulness of a unified approach that embodies both national and international experience.

The Committee has deliberated thoroughly on the ramifications of the issues pertaining to safety and health in mines. In the course of the discussions, the members of the Committee presented and discussed forceful arguments on matters of real substance. We were able to achieve our goal within the framework of tripartism and in a spirit of cooperation, goodwill and dialogue. I am pleased to report to the Conference that all the points raised in the Committee were made in a constructive spirit of collaboration. These points and arguments are clearly expressed in the report of the Committee. It has thus proposed corresponding texts of conclusions as a basis for the second discussion at the next session of the International Labour Conference in 1995, with a view to the adoption of a Convention and a Recommendation. It is important to note that these conclusions have been structured so as to provide the flexibility that will enable the member States, when ratifying them, to apply appropriate practical measures in accordance with national law and practice.

My task as Chairman of the Committee would have been impossible to accomplish without the support and cooperation I enjoyed from all the Officers and members of the Committee. I should particularly like to thank the Government members, both as individuals and as groups, for having put their vast professional knowledge at the disposal of the Committee. My thanks also go to the Vice-Chairmen and the Employer and Worker members of the Committee. The Vice-Chairman of the Employers' group, Mr. Pirie, is an excellent manager with extensive technical expertise. The ever-resourceful Worker Vice-Chairman, Mr. Maitland, made many significant contributions to the work of the Committee, and he did it by making effective use of the expert knowledge in his group. I would also like to extend my appreciation to the Reporter of our Committee, Mr. Thompson, for his hard work in the Committee, in which he spared no effort in applying his expert knowledge to produce an accurate record of our work. Finally, this speech would be incomplete if I failed to acknowledge the role of the representative of the Secretary-General, Dr. Pinnagoda, and his team of devoted experts, secretaries, translators, clerks and support staff.

In conclusion, I would like to call on the Conference to approve the Report and adopt the proposed conclusions, as well as a resolution to place on the agenda of the next session of the Conference an item entitled "Safety and health in mines". I am confident that the new instruments, when adopted, will be an important step forward towards the protection of safety and health of mineworkers.

Mr. GHATOWAR (Deputy Minister, Health and Family Welfare, India) – The occupational health and safety of workers is an area in which the ILO has done significant work over the years. The Organization has also established a number of Conventions in this area in the course of nearly four decades. What has been lacking, however, is a Convention specific to mineworkers.

Conventions are always ratified with reference to specific industry situations in the member States. Where several industries are involved, disparate Conventions present serious difficulties in ratification.

India is a typical example of a country where the standards now contemplated in the report of the Committee on Safety and Health in Mines already exist as a result of national laws and infrastructures. But the disparate ILO Conventions hitherto formulated have not been ratified in the context of the mining industry because these Conventions are applicable to several industries in which they cannot yet be applied in India.

It is, therefore, indeed timely that the ILC should now adopt international standards in the form of a specific Convention applicable to mines and containing standards relating to radiation, noise, air pollution, chemical safety, occupational health and major industrial accidents.

We in India have a long tradition, dating back to the commencement of this century, of state intervention in respect of ensuring safety and health in mines. Our Constitution also directs the State to provide for just and humane conditions of work. We have established national statutes and a network of supervisory and regulatory mechanisms.

In my country, over the last four decades, there has also been a spectacular expansion of the mining industry in the fuel, metallic and non-metallic sectors. Nearly a million workers are employed in this industry.

Adoption of modern mining techniques and intensive mechanization has added new dimensions to the issue of occupational safety and health for mineworkers.

Safety and health concerns cannot be imposed on mining enterprises. An appropriate culture for ensuring the safety and health of workers has to develop endogenously within the enterprises. Investment in this area should be construed by the employers as investment in the industry. The workers should individually and collectively make it a part of their daily routine voluntarily to safeguard safety and health.

We have evolved in our country bilateral and tripartite mechanisms to ensure safety and health at the enterprise and national levels. I would make particular mention of enterprise-level works inspectors.

Statistical data on fatal and serious accidents and health disorders should be carefully scrutinized by the management and the official machinery to detect trends and tendencies should be set in motion, so that preventive steps are taken on time. In fact, a whole national system of monitoring could be established, based on the study of the statistical data.

Often, concentration on problems of safety results in health concerns not being given due attention. I understand that a proposal for mandatory health inspections of the workers has not found universal approval in the Committee. Health problems could be latent and lurking killers; all the ILO constituents should give serious reconsideration to the concept of mandatory health inspections.

Mineworkers are especially subject to stress in the workplace. This could result in psychiatric disorders and affect the productivity of the workers adversely. This is, therefore, an area which deserves special attention by the employers, workers and medical professionals. Some of the speakers at the Thirteenth World Congress on Occupational Health and Safety, held in New Delhi, also drew special attention to this stress factor at the workplace.

The Committee has sought to define the term "employer". Mining operations and the employer-employee relationship could vary extensively from country to country. It would have been more practical to stipulate that persons responsible for the safety and health of workers in mines should be clearly identifiable, and to leave it to the member States to specify, in their national laws, who should be construed as employers for this purpose.

The establishment of an international standard for mine safety is no doubt very vital in itself. In order to secure ratification and implementation of this standard, there should be concurrent ILO projects for technical cooperation to build national capabilities. The need for such action programmes to promote ratification and conformity to standards has also been emphasized by the Director-General in his Report to the International Labour Conference.

The ILO has at least three projects, with an outlay of US$5 million, in the pipeline for implementation in the area of mine safety in India. These are to be funded by mobilizing extra-budgetary resources. We look forward to the early implementation of these projects.

The PRESIDENT – There being no further speakers, we will move on to the adoption of the report. I take it that the body of the report, that is paragraphs 1 to 178, is adopted.

(The report is adopted, paragraphs 1 to 178.)

PROPOSED CONCLUSIONS, SUBMITTED BY THE COMMITTEE ON SAFETY AND HEALTH IN MINES: ADOPTION

The PRESIDENT – We now move to the adoption of the Proposed Conclusions, point by point. May I take it that the Proposed Conclusions, points 1 to 49, are adopted?

(The Proposed Conclusions are adopted.)

RESOLUTION TO PLACE ON THE AGENDA OF THE NEXT ORDINARY SESSION OF THE CONFERENCE AN ITEM ENTITLED "SAFETY AND HEALTH IN MINES": ADOPTION

The PRESIDENT – Let us now proceed to adopt the resolution to place on the agenda of the next ordinary session of the Conference an item entitled "Safety and health in mines". If there are no objections, I shall take it that the resolution is adopted.

(The resolution is adopted.)

The PRESIDENT – We have now completed the consideration of the report, the Proposed Conclusions and the resolution submitted by the Committee on Safety and Health in Mines.

I would like to express my deep thanks and gratitude to the Chairman, the Vice-Chairmen, the Reporter, and the other members of the Committee, and the secretariat, for the excellent work they have done.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE APPLICATION OF STANDARDS: SUBMISSION, DISCUSSION AND ADOPTION

The PRESIDENT – We shall now move on to the next item on our agenda, the report of the Committee on the Application of Standards, contained in Provisional Record No. 25.

I invite the Chairman of the Committee, Mr. Elmiger, Government delegate, Switzerland; the Employer Vice-Chairman, Mr. Wisskirchen, Employers' adviser, Germany; the Worker Vice-Chairman, Mr. Peirens, Workers' delegate, Belgium; and the reporter, Ms. Dlamini, Government adviser, Switzerland, to come to the rostrum, and invite Ms. Dlamini to submit the report to the Conference.

Ms. DLAMINI (Government adviser, Swaziland; Reporter of the Committee on the Application of Standards) – It is my honour to address this plenary to put before you the report of the Committee on the Application of Standards. It is a great privilege for me to take part in this session of the International Labour Conference marking the 75th anniversary of the ILO, an anniversary that represents 75 years in the pursuit of social justice.

The Committee was set up under article 7 of the Standing Orders of the Conference and proceeded to examine item III on the Conference agenda, "Information and reports on the application of Conventions and Recommendations".

The Committee held 19 sittings. The work of the Conference Committee, as in the past, was based upon the Report of the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations, the green Report III (Part 4A) of the Conference documents. Part One is the general report of the Conference Committee report; it focuses on the general report of the Committee of Experts.

Part One contains five sections (A-E). These include an introduction, and deal with general questions relating to international labour standards, reports requested under Article 19 of the ILO Constitution – this year on the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organize Convention, 1948 (No. 87) and the Right to Organize and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) – the future of the ILO's standard setting, and compliance with specific obligations.

Concerning relations between the Committee of Experts and the Conference Committee (paragraph 17), the Committee again this year hailed the high quality of the Report of the Committee of Experts, prepared as ever on the principle of independence, objectivity and impartiality. It again welcomed the presence of Mr. Ruda, Chairman of the Committee of Experts, during the Conference Committee's general discussions, as it will enable him to see more closely how the present Committee works with its own customs and traditions. This should lay the groundwork for better mutual understanding between the two committees.

Concerning ratifications and denunciations of Conventions (paragraph 28), the Committee recognized the record number of Conventions ratified by member States in the year 1993, that is, 398 ratifications from 38 member States. This brings the total number of ratifications to 6,050 as at 31 December 1993. This is encouraging as a concrete and immediate sign of the support of member States and the employers' and workers' organizations for the principles and values of the ILO. A number of the Committee members spoke of the experiences in their countries concerning recent ratifications.

The Committee turns its attention to reporting obligations at paragraph 36. It again expressed its concern at failures to meet the constitutional obligation to supply reports, as noted by the Committee of Experts. The Committee felt that this was the very essence of the reporting system since it is the very basis of the system of periodic supervision.

In paragraph 44, the Committee welcomed the new cases of progress in the application of ratified Conventions: 42 cases in 30 States and one non-metropolitan territory. In each of these cases, concrete steps have been taken to change the national law or practice as requested by the Committee of Experts. This is tangible proof of the impact of standards and the efficiency of the supervisory system. Some members of the Committee considered the progress too slow sometimes and regretted that the supervisory bodies in some cases had to return to cases discussed for several years.

The Committee paid particular attention to the importance of the roles played by the employers' and workers' organizations in the supervisory system (paragraphs 53 and 54). It shared the views generally expressed by the Committee of Experts that progress in the organization of consultations could help solve problems in applying standards at the national level and avoid reference to an international body.

Turning to the questions concerning the application of certain Conventions, the Committee noted that the Committee of Experts quite urgently gave special attention to the problem of contemporary slavery, especially of children. The Committee called attention to the fact that child labour in most cases is forced labour, and is often a form of economic exploitation which violates the fundamental rights of the child as well as basic human rights as set out in many United Nations instruments. Members of the Committee noted that political will is essential if child labour is to be stopped. The same members felt that poverty is of course partly responsible for the problem, but child labour was most often due to inequitable income distribution policy and limitations on equal opportunities, especially as concerns educational opportunities.

There were different views expressed – starting at paragraph 60 – in the Committee on the issue of employment policy. Workers agreed with the Committee of Experts that most often macroeconomic policy objectives tended to favour overcoming inflation and public finance. They stressed the predominance of monetary policy objectives, which meant that employment was really only a dependent variable, indeed, a secondary objective. As noted in paragraph 65, the Employers did not share the concerns expressed by the Committee of Experts, that governments favour growth over employment. They felt that the stimulation of economic activity required monetary stability, a solid national budget, a responsible political economy, a reasonable and effective system of collective bargaining and labour legislation, and a responsible policy on wages and working time – all of them encouraging private initiative and production. The Employers believed that full employment could not be an absolute objective and could not be realized to the detriment of other aims in the long term.

Other objectives covered in the general discussion included the application of international standards in export enterprises and industrial zones, technical cooperation and standards, and relations between ILO and international organizations.

The Committee held an important discussion on the General Survey of the Committee of Experts, which this year examined the effect given to the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organize Convention, 1948 (No. 87), and the Right to Organize and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98). The Committee unanimously welcomed the choice of Conventions Nos. 87 and 98 for the 1994 General Survey, particularly given that this year the ILO was commemorating a double anniversary: the founding of the Organization and the Declaration of Philadelphia. The fact that the principles of freedom of association, along with tripartism, are the cornerstone of the ILO's actions and policies escaped not a single speaker in the discussions of the General Survey. Of course the discussion on the General Survey was at once broad-ranging and detailed. Its importance does, however, merit special attention; yet pointing out any one paragraph of the Conference Committee report could not do justice to the complexity of the debate. Let me highlight the Committee's conclusion, found at paragraph 180. There, the Committee expressed the hope that the General Survey and the discussion in the Conference Committee would contribute to the recognition and promotion of the principles of freedom of association embodied in the ILO Constitution. The Committee made a solemn call for the ratification of these fundamental Conventions, the principles of which were at the core of the ILO mandate, and the respect of which was an indispensable prerequisite for the defence of workers' and employers' interests throughout the world. This was particularly so in an international context characterized by very rapid changes and accelerated globalization of the economy.

As Reporter of the Committee, I wish to amplify its sentiments to my fellow Conference delegates.

In commemorating the 75th anniversary, this year the Committee devoted a special session of its general discussion to the theme of the future of ILO standards. Most members of the Committee believe that the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards is especially well-equipped to conduct a structured dialogue on the future of standard setting since it is, by the very nature of its activities, extremely familiar with both the potential and the limits of the standard-setting and supervisory system. This was confirmed by the very large number of speakers from the three groups in the Committee, the scope and richness of the discussions, and the interesting technical and fundamental proposals and suggestions made. These all appear in paragraphs 181 to 257.

Following these general discussions, the Committee expressed the hope that all the views voiced in the general discussion, and in particular the special sitting on the future of standards, would be documented for the Governing Body and its Committee on Legal Issues and International Labour Standards for future reference. It requested that the Director-General do everything necessary to ensure this.

Turning now to Part II of the Conference Committee's report, entitled Observations and information concerning particular countries, the Committee first took up the difficulties of individual countries' compliance with fundamental reporting obligations under the ILO Constitution. These difficulties included problems involving timely submission or failure to submit Conventions and Recommendations to the competent national authorities; failure to supply reports and information on the application of ratified Conventions; and failure to supply reports on unratified Conventions and Recommendations.

In addressing these difficulties, in paragraph 271, the Committee expressed concern at the gravity of the situation and requested the Director-General to adopt all possible measures to improve the situation and solve the problems referred to in the discussion as quickly as possible. The Committee hoped, in particular, that the multidisciplinary teams would give priority to their work in the field to the fulfilment of standards-related obligations.

The Committee considered it appropriate to draw the attention of the Conference to its discussion of the case of India, mentioned in paragraphs 276 to 278 of this report. The Committee trusted that the Government of India would take all measures necessary to correct the deficiencies noted in respect of the application of the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) and invited it to consider appropriate forms of ILO assistance, including direct contacts, to ensure that real progress was achieved by the following year in the observance of its obligations under the ILO Constitution and the Convention in question.

Before closing its work, the Committee held a special session to pay homage to Mr. Edward Hickey, Worker member of the United States, who has served on the Committee for 30 years now and is this year retiring from this service.

In closing, I would like to note that this year's discussion was held in a spirit of cooperation, and that there has been genuine, and indeed intense, dialogue between the three groups. Beyond the differences in views, there has been a willingness and determination to continue the dialogue with a view to promoting a better application of international standards. This was despite concern expressed in the Committee over the short duration of the Conference this year.

With this summary, I leave the fate of the Report on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations with the plenary and recommend its approval. This is one of the essential elements for the success of the work of the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference in its 75th year of existence.

Original German: Mr. WISSKIRCHEN (Employers' adviser, Germany; Employer Vice-Chairman of the Committee on the Application of Standards) – This year, our Committee is submitting to the plenary of the Conference a report which is exceptional from the point of view of its volume and contents. Despite the fact that we had less time than usual, we were able to have very intensive and useful discussions, and they are well documented in the report. The Reporter has, and I must thank her for this, already referred to a number of important points. And we are also bound to restrict our comments to a few specific issues.

In the first general discussion in our Committee, we always deal with questions of principle connected with our work, that is the question of the content, the duties and the practical application of the supervision of labour standards. From time to time, old differences between our Committee and the Committee of Experts arise, but, in the main, these are clarified. The Workers regularly say that they agree unreservedly with the position of the Committee of Experts and that it coincides entirely with their own.

In these circumstances, we can say that we are all in agreement; indeed, since 1991, the Committee of Experts has been consistently and quite rightly stressing that they do not take any decisions which are binding, that their rulings do not have ergaomnes effect, and that the Conference Committee may, indeed, adopt divergent positions on these questions. The Conference Committee, in particular both sides of industry, quite naturally make use of this opportunity to put forward their own views rather than those of the Committee of Experts. Therefore, in theory and practice, there are no real differences as far as this question is concerned – although the various statements made in the discussions might not always give this impression.

In a broader context it is striking that the Committee of Experts drew on historical facts and developments in their report this year. The experts describe their job as technical and legal supervision, whereas the Conference Committee is tripartite, and therefore a political forum, and its task is to hold a dialogue with the governments. According to the Office documents, which establish the terms of reference for both bodies, it is clear that the Committee of Experts has to give an opinion as to the facts, but it does not have any precedence with regard to legal interpretation. We have quoted our exact references. You will find these references in paragraph 21 in the report of our Committee.

We hope that the emphasis placed by the Committee of Experts on the tripartite and political nature of the Conference Committee does not imply any idea of hierarchy or rank. Such an intended implication would be difficult to understand in an Organization like ours, because our main special and highly praised feature is tripartism. All the main organs are tripartite and thus – in terms of what has been said – "political".

Our Organization has known for a long time now that its objective to promote social justice cannot just be achieved by issuing new standards. We will come back to the point. But also the supervisory machinery for some time now has become multi-layered. These layers now include different forms of consultations, support and technical assistance. In this connection, we feel that the relationship between standards and technical cooperation should be thought out anew and in greater depth. The traditional idea whereby technical cooperation could, almost on its own, bring about the application of standards is simply not enough today.

Part One of the report of the Committee (General Report) contains a brief summary of the Convention to which we are paying particular attention this year, i.e. the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29). We have laid particular emphasis on the exploitation of children through prostitution. We are all disgusted that such circumstances exist, and we fully support the appeal being launched to all member States to make greater efforts to do away with these inhuman practices.

Traditionally, the experts also examine, in the General Report, the issue of employment policy, as described in the Application of the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122). The experts have expressed their concern that – and this is possibly a new trend – economic growth is not being accompanied by growth in employment. These doubts are not verified empirically. We think that the destructive criticism of growth is a very poor counsel if you are trying to solve problems. There is, in any case, no proof that the job-reduction effect of higher productivity is greater than the job-creating effect of the growth of production. We must not forget factors which reduce the level of employment, for example, the increase in the service sector, the slowing rate of capital investment, the reduction in average working time and a greater proportion of part-time jobs.

The number of people employed in the OECD region from 1970 to 1992 increased by more than a quarter – i.e. by nearly 80 million workers. However, this impressive rate of growth has not kept pace with the growth in the number of people looking for jobs; therefore we need more growth and economic activity. But the real problem is not so much the reduction in the number of jobs but the fact that not enough new jobs are being created. We know that only sound conditions, such as a stable currency, a responsible financial and economic policy and effective labour and legislation and collective bargaining are capable of creating confidence which encourage private initiative; and only profitable jobs really promote employment; indeed there is no state authority, no "secret recipe", which can create jobs artificially, or maintain such jobs.

Therefore, we must resist a tendency to exaggerate the importance of the labour market and employment policy in such a way that a second and artificial labour market is established. This would inevitably result in negative repercussions on the real labour market. In order to retain unprofitable jobs, we must exact a greater toll from profitable jobs.

I would just like to conclude my comments on employment policy with a general thought. We really cannot praise and celebrate the end of the centrally-planned state and the related lack of human freedoms, and at the same time increase our calls for state intervention in the economy and society.

The General Survey this year under article 19 of the ILO Constitution is devoted to the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organize Convention, 1948 (No. 87) and the Right to Organize and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98). Without any doubt these are fundamental issues. It is regrettable that for reasons of time we can only raise a few points here.

We employers share the view of the experts on most of the questions on which they have taken a position – at least, as far as several principles are concerned. These principles are, of course, derived from the Conventions themselves; but in a few places we would like to have seen more qualified reflections, leading to slightly different results. But this does not alter the fact that we have reached a wide consensus on these problems.

But we cannot agree at all, in any way, with the wide-ranging statements made by the experts in Chapter V of their report which deals with the right to strike. What the experts have been gradually developing on this subject here, cannot be seen as a binding right to strike for member States. This is rather an attempt at producing new jurisprudence.

In order to avoid any misunderstanding, we do not dispute the fact that there are strikes and lockouts and that they have to exist; and we recognize the fact that the social partners have every liberty to resort to such measures. What is in dispute however is the detail and the limits placed on such measures. These are not taken from the Conventions, because the Conventions do not say anything on this subject.

We know that the extremely detailed right to strike, which has been developed by the experts, does exist in some countries. However, most States, if they do recognize labour disputes, have widely varying laws on these questions, and the experts have quite rightly pointed this out.

In part, the experts use historical arguments in this connection and say that the right to strike was mentioned on many occasions when these two Conventions were being prepared. But, at the Conference in 1947 and 1948, no specific amendments were tabled in this connection. And so this reminder of history given to us by the experts is incomplete and does not go back far enough because, in the Office report to the 31st Session of the International Labour Conference in 1948, it is stated explicitly that the proposed Convention only refers to freedom of association and not to the right to strike – a question which was to be dealt with in a later connection.

The same observation was made in the discussion in the plenary in 1948 and, during the discussion of the corresponding Convention No. 98, three explicit amendments were tabled to the effect that a guarantee for the right to strike should be included in the Convention. These amendments were rejected on the grounds that the question of the right to strike was not covered by the proposed text and that the question should be dealt with at a later stage. The exact references are contained in paragraphs 115-148 of our report in particular in paragraph 118.

Given this historical background and the fact that strikes and lockouts are not referred to in the instruments, it is difficult to understand – and also unacceptable – that the experts have developed a comprehensive and highly detailed right to strike. This gradual attempt at jurisprudence extends from the first reference of the right to strike in the Committee of Experts' report of 1959, where it was only mentioned in one paragraph, to the very comprehensive Chapter V which contains 44 paragraphs this year.

When all is said and done, the experts base their arguments on the premise of an unlimited right to strike and for any limitation, demand a special – yet only seldom admissable – justification. Because of this false assumption, most of the individual statements they make on the right to strike are unacceptable. In this context, we shall make a brief reference to the political strike. This is always recognized by the experts, so long as it is not a so-called "purely political strike".

In practice, however, there seems to be no such thing as a purely political strike because the Committee of Experts always see in a strike something of protest against government policy. Therefore, the strike is usually considered to be permissible. In this connection, however, we are very worried that experts also apply this formula if a strike is quite clearly against decisions taken by a democratic parliament which has been freely elected in equitable and general elections. In a democracy, you cannot have a strike against the supreme sovereign authority.

In these circumstances, it does not get us anywhere to have in a discussion inflexible and categorical statements instead of arguments. The only help would be for the Committee of Experts themselves to find a return route, or if the true legislator in this Organization, i.e. the plenary of the Conference itself, were – after very careful preparation – to deal explicitly and for the first time with this subject, as was the intention in 1948 but as has never actually occurred. Only in this way could this important batch of questions on the right to strike be removed from the twilight zone of unfounded, creeping jurisprudence. A clean-up of this type would also be salutary for the effectiveness and credibility of the supervisory system.

In all these controversies, however, we should not lightly forget or underestimate the fact that we have wide-ranging consensus on core questions of freedom of association.

This is something we all know, and, every year in our discussions we feel that many member countries have specific problems in this connection but we are sure that we can work together effectively in this area.

The third part of our general discussion dealt with the future of standard setting in the ILO. In its traditional supervisory function, our Committee learns each year which standards are causing problems in practice and for what reasons. This knowledge is a virtually automatic outcome of our work. The ILO must draw lessons from this situation. It cannot go on acting as if nothing has changed. It is being signalled so clearly that the existing ILO standards edifice is no longer completely in order and that we cannot go on piling up new comprehensive and detailed standards from year to year, as we have done in the past. One warning signal to this effect is the clearly falling number of ratifications over the past two decades. Absolute figures may not give a clear picture because they do not make allowance for the increasing number of member countries.

As is being perceived increasingly at a national level, it is no longer possible to regulate all and everything with specific provisions. We also need to realize this internationally within the ILO. Every potential legislator must also check much more carefully whether to issue new regulations to achieve a specific objective and what consequences they would have, or whether it would be better to refrain from legislating and try to deal with the problem another way.

Nowadays, the ILO too could attain many of its just as essential objectives by other means than standards. Moreover, it is unlikely that the ILO's standard-setting function will be put out of action. Only, in the future, it will have to check more thoroughly what should be the subject of a standard, what should be the content and when the standard should be prepared. And, in particular, we must be looking at alternatives to standard setting. Certainly standard-setting procedures are in many ways in need of improvement.

The Employers have made substantive proposals on all these questions. They have been presented in an exemplary fashion in the report of the Committee, so I do not have to comment on them now. I will just draw your attention, for example, to paragraphs 195 to 224 of the report of the Committee. What came out of the discussion we had this year on the social clause often seemed the product of goodwill on this subject; but it scarcely seemed to be supported by practical and specific proposals. For example, one cannot see how it will be possible to maintain the ILO's fundamental principle that member States assume their responsibilities and their obligations voluntarily. On the other hand, the dangers of the proposed social clauses became that much clearer: in the end, free world trade may be restricted and there will be a further push for protectionist measures. We feel that the ILO has to act with extreme caution in this area.

Because of the shorter Conference time and the additional general debate, the Committee could only devote four-and-a-half days to its main task this year, of checking whether and how far member countries are fulfilling their obligations to the ILO. We discussed problems of application with 28 member countries and the "automatic" or "reporting" problems with several dozen others. For the second time, this year, we grouped all the automatic cases into a single afternoon, and this proved satisfactory. Most countries accepted the invitation and, this year, it was perhaps even more clear that the basis and the solidity of the supervisory machinery depends on as many countries as possible fulfilling their obligations and fulfilling them in good time. However, the number of countries which fall short of their obligations is still frighteningly high. We hope, therefore, that the modifications in the reporting system decided on by the Governing Body in November will have positive effects.

This year, the substantive cases related to 11 different Conventions. The main focus, as it so often is, was on protection of freedom of association under the Right to Organize and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98). In all cases, the Committee came to a unanimous consensus conclusion. In dealing with child forced labour, the Committee felt that the Indian Government was not being energetic enough in taking all the necessary steps to put a desired end to this phenomenon. Under these circumstances, the Committee's conclusions were included in a special paragraph in the general section of the report.

It proved possible to carry out the comprehensive tasks of our Committee only by a strenuous joint effort by all parties. We were very fortunate to have a very competent Chairman who had the right mixture of liberal and target-oriented leadership in guiding the discussions in the Committee, and we owe much of our progress to him. We would also like to thank the Reporter for her presentation of our report and the many visible and less-visible staff members led by Mr. Bartolomei de la Cruz. They made an enormous contribution to the work of our Committee and we would like to pay tribute to them. The Committee's need to work by consensus calls for a considerable degree of cooperation within the Committee. This cooperation was possible and was in fact put into practice. We would particularly like to thank Mr. Peirens (Workers' delegate, Belgium), the Spokesman of the Workers' group for this.

As the Reporter has already mentioned, we would like to wish a very warm farewell to the departing Workers' adviser of the United States, Mr. Hickey. For decades he has been an institution in the Committee, and we would like to thank him for his very special contribution.

And my concluding words of thanks go to the Employers' group. In the Committee it was a particularly active group this year, and I would particularly like to thank all the members for their unfailing support and above all my friend, Mr. Potter (Employers' adviser, United States), for his special contribution.

We recommend that the plenary of the Conference adopts this report. I must also say it is well worth reading.

Original French: Mr. PEIRENS (Workers' delegate, Belgium; Worker Vice-Chairman of the Committee on the Application of Standards) – An important part of the work of our Committee was devoted to this very in-depth discussion of standard-setting activities now and in the future, as well as the general survey on freedom of association and collective bargaining.

A very large consensus emerged around many essential issues, despite the fact that differences remain on a number of questions.

The acknowledgement of the universality of standards and of the ongoing relevance of the fundamental objectives of the ILO and the need to strengthen the system of supervision, were in general a matter of agreement in our Committee.

In a changing world the importance and the relevance of international labour standards and international labour law have been explicitly recognized.

The ILO, its principles and values, are now more than ever an essential counterweight to unbridled competition, social exclusion and poverty, both in developing and industrialized countries.

That is why we would like to draw your attention to the fact that respect for standards is not merely a legal, moral and social obligation, but also an economic necessity.

The Worker and Employer members all stressed the need for universal labour standards as a framework for economic activities and in order to determine the rules of play applicable throughout the world.

Both groups, Employers and Workers, recognized the importance of a good system of industrial relations and social legislation, ensuring humane working conditions, to establish and to maintain a climate of confidence which is essential to economic growth and employment.

In this context we would like to draw your attention to the position taken by the Committee of Experts on the Application of Standards which appears in paragraph 21 of its report and in the final comments of its general survey. The experts are of the view that standards relating to fundamental human rights are essential regardless of national circumstances or economic fluctuations.

This official position adopted by the Committee of Experts we believe is crucial. Fundamental standards provide countries, workers and employers, as well as their respective organizations, with the possibility of progressively developing their economic and social system.

The Workers' group insisted that all countries, whatever their social and economic circumstances or their political system, should respect the principles and Conventions on freedom of association, collective bargaining, prohibition of forced labour, child labour and non-discrimination in employment.

These principles and Conventions are the heart of a world social platform or world social charter as envisaged by the Committee of Experts and the Workers' group. And it is in this context that we must view the proposal made by the Workers' group for the inclusion of a social clause in trade and cooperation agreements.

This social clause, as we see it, has nothing to do with protectionism.

Respect for this social platform, and as a result for the social clause, would provide for a better distribution of the fruits of economic development and possible economic growth, both within and among countries. Ultimately, it will stimulate international trade since this respect will ensure the equitable distribution of purchasing power among the population.

The social clause gives rise to a number of questions on the part of the Employers' group in the Committee. However, it is important to note that these are basically questions of form rather than substance. On behalf of the Workers' group we urge the Employers' group to analyse our proposals before they adopt any definitive position on the social clause.

The social clause is not an alternative to dialogue and persuasion – it is the basis of the philosophy of the supervisory system. And that is why the lack of cooperation with the supervisory bodies, non-respect for obligations to reply to the supervisory bodies and the absence of a follow-up to the conclusions of our Committee with respect to fundamental Conventions, should be taken into account in the application of the social clause.

The clause will go a long way towards strengthening dialogue and persuasion and as the Director-General said, here in this room yesterday, the ILO will actively pursue discussion on this issue.

Given the radical changes that have taken place internationally, the globalization of the economy, fragmentation of enterprises and growing competition, our Committee feels that it is necessary to strengthen the supervisory system. It is important for the ILO to be able to intervene quickly, effectively and with authority. The strong points of the system, such as dialogue and cooperation among governments and supervisory bodies, will in this way be strengthened further.

In this respect the Committee of Experts made a number of very interesting suggestions, most of which were favourably received by members of the Workers' group.

I refer, in particular, to strengthening workers' and employers' organizations and the establishment of tripartite committees similar to the Committee on Freedom of Association for forced labour and the prohibition of discrimination in employment.

Employers, as well as certain governments, also put forward a number of proposals that deserve very careful consideration.

On the other hand, the position of the Employers on the respective roles of the Committee of Experts and our Committee provoked some reactions within our group. Despite the fact that the Employers endorse most of the positions adopted by the Committee of Experts, they reserve their right to criticize in particular with regard to the right to strike.

Such an attitude, which we believe is based more on opportunistic and political considerations than legal arguments, runs the risk of undermining the authority of the experts and thereby the entire supervisory system, including, those aspects which have absolutely nothing to do with the specific modalities of the right to strike. The problem arises even more during the discussion of individual cases.

For our group, we feel that the two Committees are complementary. The Committee of Experts provides technical analysis and our Committee ensures the contributions of those on the ground Reports sent in by member States are the basis for the supervisory system and our Committee noted with great concern that a considerable number of the member States either do not respect this obligation or only partially comply. We reject the arguments of administrative constraints or overwork.

Most of the questions only require simple answers, so it is really a mater of establishing priorities on the part of governments.

Our Committee expressed its firm hope that by adjusting the procedures for requesting reports, as approved by the Governing Body in November 1993, we can in this way improve the situation considerably and we will continue to monitor what happens and evaluate the situation on a regular basis.

Our Committee also urged the Director-General to take all necessary measures to rectify the situation. We also stressed the need for the multidisciplinary teams to give absolute priority to ensuring that member States respected standards and obligations.

The Worker and Employer members, as well as the experts, unreservedly condemned the exploitation of children, particularly through prostitution and pornography in relation to a certain type of tourism.

We would therefore advise you to read very carefully paragraphs 89 and 90 of the Report of the Committee of Experts on the application of Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29).

The Committee of Experts and our Committee stressed the need for tourists' home countries to forbid any advertising or promotion of tourism which is linked to the sexual exploitation of children.

With respect to child labour, the Workers' group stressed that for the most part its abolition depended on the political willingness to do so.

While poverty is one of the reasons for child labour, such labour is most often the consequence of any absence of an effective social, fiscal and educational policy.

We delved deeply into the problems of the application of the Employment Policy Convention, 164 (No. 122).

We would like to point out that the Committee of Experts is very concerned about the failure to regard full employment as the objective of convention No. 122 and the lack of social dialogue and tripartite consultations.

Despite the statements that have been made in all international and national fora by governments concerning the importance they give to employment policy the reality is quite different.

Monetary policy dominates everything.

The recommendations or conditions made by the Council of Ministers of Finance of the European Union (ECOFIN), the IMF, the World Bank and the OECD demonstrate that employment is regarded as a mere variable.

In addition, some of their recommendations run counter to collective bargaining and tripartite consultation which are constitutional principles of the ILO.

The Committee of Experts also highlighted an important structural change, namely that economic growth does not generate additional employment.

We would like to clarify a misunderstanding which occurred among the Employers on the one hand and the Workers' group and the experts on the other. We do of course believe that economic growth is essential to the growth of employment.

However, economic growth is not enough in itself. Governments, international and supranational bodies as well as the social partners must in this new context develop a dynamic programme of employment promotion.

As the experts have stressed, this action this action cannot be limited merely to an active market policy. The discussion of the general survey on freedom of association and collective bargaining continued over four meetings. I would like to stress here certain aspects of this very in-depth discussion which took place.

Our Committee has recognized the quality of the General Survey in an international context characterized by very rapid changes and globalization of the economy.

It expressed the hope that this study might contribute to the recognition and promotion of the principles of freedom of association and collective bargaining.

Our Committee solemnly appealed for ratification of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organize Convention, 1948 (No. 87) and the Right to Organize and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98). Out of the nine chapters of the General Survey, the Committee for the most part supported eight. The Employers and certain Governments have some reservations on one or two specific points in the eight chapters.

However, the chapter on the right to strike provoked a reaction on the part of the Employers. There was consensus on the principle of the right to strike. As Mr. Wisskirchen has just recalled, the Employers expressed their disagreement on the question of whether or not Conventions relating to freedom of association should comprise extended and detailed regulations on the right to strike.

They criticized the position taken by the Committee of Experts. The Committee, however, had unanimously adopted its position which is that the right to strike is an essential element of freedom of association.

We would like to draw your attention to the fact that all the Workers and Governments who spoke during the debate supported the position taken on the right to strike by the Committee of Experts.

There were certain reservations by some Governments on the right to strike in the public service. The experts also noted that in most member States, practice on the right to strike is to a large part consistent with Convention No. 87.

We also discussed the problems of application in 27 countries (29 cases in all). These are fewer cases than in previous years, as a result of the time constraints as due to the shortening of the Conference. The new Conference schedule may well dilute the quality of the supervisory system.

We also devoted a meeting to countries which have failed to respect their obligation to submit reports or to submit Conventions to the appropriate national authorities.

Our Committee was able to draw up a balanced list of individual cases. The selection criteria were correctly summarized by the United States Government member during the discussion of the case of New Zealand in respect of the Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100). Our Committee cannot limit its discussions only to the most flagrant violations of fundamental rights. We should also discuss problems of application and cases of progress in relation to technical Conventions. Moreover, we must analyse social policy developments in certain countries in order to promote the application of standards in those countries.

We have placed the conclusions on forced child labour and bonded labour in India (Convention No. 29) in a special paragraph of our report.

The situation is still very worrying. This case has been repeatedly discussed and we are unfortunately unable to note any progress. Moreover, India did not send in its report on time, so it is our hope that the special paragraph will serve to encourage the Government to respect Convention No. 29.

We are also carefully following the situation of child labour in Thailand. We hope that the direct contact mission will have a decisive impact.

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) creates problems in all countries, but wage differentials are more pronounced in countries where governments have not established effective legal machinery and have not taken dynamic action. That is why we discussed the cases of Saudia Arabia, Japan and New Zealand.

With respect to New Zealand, the essential issue was whether or not the existing actions and machinery were sufficient to guarantee equality of treatment in a deregulated labour market. The conclusion was negative.

We also discussed issues of substances as to the organization, operation, performance and solidity of the private pension system in Peru. We have serious doubts in this regard. The reply of the Government to the Committee was not convincing. The system in Peru is a carbon copy of the Chilean pension scheme.

Peru's employment policy is not consistent with the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122). The Government has not organized consultations with workers' and employers' organizations. But, as stressed by the Committee of Experts, social dialogue is of particular importance during periods of structural change.

The Government alleges that social protection is the main obstacle to employment. The possible costs and benefits of structural adjustment programmes are not equitably distributed. This should be a priority objective for governments and international organizations such as the IMF and the World Bank, and the ILO should be actively involved in the programmes, studies and regulations of the IMF and the World Bank.

We also discussed violations of such fundamental Conventions as the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organize Convention, 1948 (No. 87) and the Right to Organize and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) in Germany (denial of the right to strike of civil servants in the very broad sense of the term), Bangladesh, Cameroon, Colombia, Indonesia, Malaysia, Morocco, Myanmar, Pakistan, Sudan, Turkey and the United Kingdom. Despite the fact that these are fundamental Conventions, the situation has improved little or not at all, or if there has been progress it is much too slow in the great majority of the countries.

As I mentioned, although there was considerable consensus and unanimity, there are still differences of view and approach, first of all with the employers in relation to the right to strike. Of course, they recognize the right to strike in principle, but when it comes to practice and the realities of actually exercising the right to strike, views tend to diverge.

Secondly, different emphasis is placed on the importance and above all the universality of standards. The Workers' group continues to stress the fact that even, and indeed above all in the context of globalization, standards and their universality should be respected in order to ensure balanced growth, giving priority to the improvement of living and working conditions.

One has the impression that the employers and certain governments, without calling into question the importance of standards, are stressing above all deregulation as an essential condition for economic development.

Priority is therefore given to adaptation to prevailing national circumstances and to flexibility. Standards become and I quote "one means among others". There is much talk of excessive regulation being a brake on economic and hence social development.

We have seen this difference of approach in our general discussion as well as in the discussion of individual cases, particularly in relation to Spain and the Termination of Employment Convention, 1982 (No. 158).

We are very much aware that the debate on these points will continue in the years ahead.

In conclusion, I should like to thank and pay tribute to our Chairman, Jean-Jacques Elmiger, who conducted the dialogue with such talent and humour. We would also like to thank our Reporter, Mrs. Khabo, the representative of the Director-General, Mr. Bartolomei de la Cruz, Mr. Zenger and Mr. Gernigon, as well as all the Office staff, and Mr. Coen Damen of the Bureau for Workers' Activities. We also thank the interpreters for their efforts and devotion.

I would also like to thank all the members of our Committee – the Government delegates, the Employers and particularly their spokesperson, Mr. Wisskirchen, for his spirit of dialogue.

I also wish to extend warm thanks to the members of the Workers' group and, above all, to the Officers of our group, our friends Ken Thomas, Ahmed, Venturini and Agyei, and lastly to Ed Hickey who has for 30 years aided and supported the Workers' group of the Committee. We organized a special sitting to thank him for his help, his great wisdom and his sense of dialogue. The conclusions of that special sitting are recorded in paragraph 293 of the report.

Our report was adopted unanimously by the Committee and I also commend it to you for adoption.

Original Arabic: Mr. AL-KHALIDI (Government delegate, Saudi Arabia) – In the Name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! I would like to congratulate the President first of all on his election to the presidency and to commend him on the way in which he has guided the work of our Conference and enabled us to be successful in our deliberations. I would also like to address my thanks to the Chairman of the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards, Mr. Elmiger, and to the Vice-Chairmen. All three helped us in our work and we have been able to produce a report which is certainly voluminous, but also extremely objective.

This report adopted at the current session of the Conference, which in my opinion is the international standards session, is one of the most important achievements of this session of the Conference. In fact, a chapter of the Director-General's Report was devoted to standards, and he went into some detail on this subject. It was also an important issue for general debate. The Committee on the Application of Standards held a meeting which was attended by the Director-General and which was devoted to the future of standards. The report records a considerable amount of the comments made during that session by the various groups. The views expressed during the discussion on the Director-General's Report reflect the views of the 171 member States of this Organization, and of the social partners of those States. All these members represent the international community. When the Organization was founded, there were only 42 Members. This means that the new international community which you all represent, and which is represented by these 171 flags at the front of the hall, is a new reality and a global civilization which is embodied in this Organization. These flags are the symbols of countries, peoples, and social, cultural and economic values. They reflect different levels of development, depending on the individual country and its society. These countries come to meetings of this Organization to express their different realities.

The future of the standard-setting procedure and the supervisory machinery depends on their interaction with countries and their response to the problems of today's world. The success of the whole system depends on how it adapts to the needs, the possibilities, and the circumstances of the developing countries, which currently represent the vast majority of the membership of the Organization. The Organization has to take into account the cultural, social and religious values of its member States. We have to take into account the opinions expressed by representatives of the three groups during the discussion of the Report of the Director-General. Our Committee's report should also be read carefully and taken into account. Then the Governing Body will have to take the necessary steps in order to update or review existing standards and to prepare new ones, taking into account the economic, cultural and social circumstances prevailing in member countries. I would like to invite this Conference to adopt the report, which I believe is an extremely objective one.

I would now like to say a few words about Mr. Hickey who was for 30 years a member of the Committee on the Application of Standards. Mr. Hickey was a sincere member of the Committee and greatly contributed to its work. I wish him all the best in the rest of his public life.

Mr. AHMED (Workers' delegate, Pakistan) – I should like to present my sincere congratulations to the distinguished members of the Committee on the Application of Standards, which was ably chaired by Mr. J.-J. Elmiger, a representative of Switzerland. The Workers' group was, with great dedication, led by Brother Peirens. We greatly appreciate the work done by the Committee, and especially by the Reporter, Mrs. Khabo J. Dlamini, and by the representatives of the Secretary-General in the Committee, who, along with their team, worked around the clock.

Although we have been celebrating the 75th anniversary of the ILO, which is a very great event, this year we have once again begun working a six-day week instead of a five-day week. We worked on Saturdays. In the Committee, we worked to 10 p.m., disregarding the provisions of international labour standards for the sake of bringing a better life to working men and women. I can only hope that member States will not follow our lead in the application of standards. We also had the privilege of the presence of the Director-General during the deliberations, as well as that of the Deputy Director-General.

As we all know, the International Labour Organization consists of 171 member States. They undertake to fully respect their commitments to the objectives of the ILO, namely to bring about social justice and improve living and working conditions of working men and women all over the world. In that context, this Organization works as a world parliament of labour by setting up standards. The supervisory machinery plays a very important role as a vehicle to promote social justice. Therefore, the role of the Committee of Experts is also highly appreciated. In that context, the Committee has dealt at length with the role of technical cooperation with member States. The Office can extend help via its multidisciplinary teams. It can also hold symposia and seminars, and provide other advisory services to the member States and social partners in order to disseminate standards within each country and to help develop infrastructure in the member States. We certainly support the recommendations which have been outlined in the report. At the same time, we feel that what has been said in relation to the employment sector in the discussion is also important, because both in the developed and the developing countries we are confronting a situation of great unemployment. In that respect I think the ILO has a very important role to play. As has been pointed out, it must play this role in the global economy, along with the IMF and the World Bank, in order to provide a social safety net for workers while structural adjustment is carried out. We are happy that during the course of the Conference there was a high-level informal meeting on employment. We hope the Office will continue to carry out these activities in order to help the member States and social partners eradicate unemployment and also to help them explain the importance of training where human resources development are lacking, particularly in developing countries.

An issue was raised in the Committee about the right of workers to strike. We believe that the basic human and trade union rights are universal and indivisible. They are to apply in both East and West, and there can be no distinction of first-rate or second-rate citizens. In that context, we would urge all member States to ratify the Convention as an important step. They should implement it, and those who have not ratified it should do so to show their commitment to the rights of workers.

The right to strike has been challenged by a distinguished member of the Employers. It was also challenged in the Committee. May I submit that I have had the honour of coming to the Conference for the past 23 years. I have regularly attended this Committee. During these years, as Brother Peirens explained, it has always been a consistent view of the Committee that the right to strike of workers is a very essential ingredient in freedom of association. Reference was made to the General Survey of 1959 and to the General Survey of 1983. Paragraph 200 of the latter plainly states that the Committee considers that the right to strike is one of the essential means available to workers for the protection of their economic and social interests. I need not read it to you in detail. In those days, there were socialist countries which did not recognize freedom of association in certain respects, and the Committee stressed that a socialist country should bring the legislation on freedom of association into conformity with the Convention. The Committee of Experts was unanimous in its conclusions that year. The Committee of Experts and the discussion that took place in the Conference Committee encouraged the promotion of freedom of association, a cause which the ILO and its Constitution are committed to promote. This is also true in relation to collective bargaining. We also have a Committee of Freedom on Association, which was set up by the Governing Body in 1951, which is tripartite and is headed by a judge of the International Court of Justice. It has always been unanimous that the right to strike is an essential ingredient in the right of freedom of association. Therefore, to challenge the right to strike, I think, is not agreeable after all these years in which it has been universally recognized. Also, the right to strike is not an end in itself. It is a means to achieving a meaningful dialogue. It is a means to achieving and promoting good industrial relations and to having meaningful collective bargaining. It is also a means to eliminating forced labour. When workers are compelled to work against their will, this amounts to forced labour. Employers should look into these aspects as well. We want, to intend, to promote good industrial relations and dialogue on an equal basis. With these observations in mind, we hope that the Employers will review their position in the light of the position taken by the Committee on Freedom of Association of the Governing Body.

In concluding, I would like to say that I believe that member States should continue the campaign against child labour by encouraging the provision of more facilities for the education and training of children in order to bring a better quality of life for future generations. I wish us success in all our future deliberations. We hope that the work that has been done by all delegates, working six days a week, can serve as an inspiration for a follow-up in our respective countries, so that there may be a better quality of life for working men and women, and peace and prosperity for mankind.

Mr. PRESIDENT – Since there are no further speakers, may I take it that the report of the Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations is adopted by the Conference?

(The report is adopted.)

The PRESIDENT – It remains for me to thank the Chairman, the Vice-Chairmen, the Reporter, the members of the Committee and the staff of the secretariat for the excellent work they have done.

CLOSING SPEECHES

The PRESIDENT – We are now going to proceed to the closing speeches of the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference.

Original French: Mr. MATINCHEV (Government delegate, Bulgaria; Vice-President of the Conference) – I am grateful for having been offered another opportunity of addressing the Conference as Vice-President of the Government group.

For myself, this election represents an expression of respect for the countries that have undertaken radical changes in their economic and social policy; as well as for Bulgaria, which I have the honour of representing, as a country whose traditions of cooperation with the ILO have existed for many years.

I would also like to express my sincere gratitude to the President at this session of the Conference, Mr. Gray, and the Vice-Presidents, Mr. Mendoza and Mr. Ould Sidi, for the atmosphere of cooperation which has existed among us, as well as to the Secretary-General, Mr. Hansenne, all the officials of the secretariat, the interpreters and other staff members who, with their professionalism and sense of responsibility, have greatly facilitated our work and contributed to its result.

The Conference has proceeded in an atmosphere of understanding and good tripartite traditions in spite of the fact that certain opinions were contradictory on some fundamental problems of our discussions. To our great satisfaction, the results of the work of the various committees are in keeping with present problems during this jubilee year.

We stress with great satisfaction the adoption of the Convention and Recommendation concerning part-time work, the resolution concerning post-apartheid South Africa, as well as the reports of the other committees.

We heard appeals for a return to the principles and values originally established in the ILO. The challenges to tripartism in this globalized world have been examined at the same time, from different aspects. This, in my opinion, is perfectly normal.

Possibilities of reforming the ILO, as an organization of the twenty-first century, have been fully appreciated, particularly if it can thus find the road towards the solution of current problems.

I would like to stress the importance of the informal ministerial meeting on employment, which was held during the course of this session. All this has made it possible for us to discuss the concrete contribution of the ILO to the preparation of the World Summit on Social Development in 1995 in Copenhagen.

We further hope that the ILO will take advantage of its full potential in the preparation of its future activities in connection with the implementation of the recommendations and decisions which we hope to adopt at that gathering.

In closing, I would like to express my gratitude to all the participants at the Conference who, thanks to their commitment to the principles and values of the Organization, have confirmed the solidarity of all those who concern themselves with labour questions. All this strengthens our conviction that, thanks to our common efforts, the true road towards the future will be found.

Original French: Mr. OULD SIDI (Employers' delegate, Mauritania; Vice-President of the Conference) – Several hundred speakers have already extended their gratitude to Mr. Gray. Please believe me, I fully join them and I would like to tell you how much I admired the way in which you have led this Conference. I would also like to express my gratitude to my colleagues, the other Vice-Presidents of the Conference, whose open-mindedness and spirit of cooperation have contributed to the success of our work.

I would like to express my deep and sincere gratitude in particular to the Secretary-General and his entire team for their competence and dedication, but also and above all for the accuracy of their judgements and their prompt action. I do not wish to mention any names lest I should forget anyone.

My gratitude also goes to those very numerous but discreet persons, who have not been working in this hall, but who have contributed to the daily success of this Conference and created excellent working conditions for its members.

I would like to express once again my deep gratitude to the members of the Employers' group for having made it possible for me to assist you, Mr. President, at this Conference and, on their behalf, to have contributed a little to its success.

This is not the time to make long speeches. Please allow me merely to say that the results obtained in the areas covered by the agenda of the Conference are greatly encouraging and have revealed the firm and unselfish will of the leaders of this Organization and of its office to ensure that the ILO remains the key organization in fields as varied as democracy, technical cooperation, labour standards, employment creation, the promotion of private initiative, but first and foremost, tripartism.

All these are concerns and values to which we are deeply attached, and which we must serve in order to safeguard our achievements and extend our horizons.

Mr. MENDOZA (Workers' delegate, Philippines; Vice-President of the Conference) – On behalf of the Workers' group which the President and I are both deeply honoured to represent, I wish to express our hearty congratulations and sincere thanks for the excellent manner in which the President has guided this memorable 81st Session of the International Labour Conference on the occasion of the 75th anniversary of the ILO. The smooth conduct of the work of the Conference within a compressed number of days, the adherence to the time-table and the reports that we have adopted, all bear testimony to the fruitfulness of the work that has been done.

I am particularly happy to note that an overwhelming majority of delegates have expressed their strong belief that the principles and values of the ILO are still valid and relevant in the world of today. The unique tripartite character of the ILO has displayed once again its true spirit in bringing in consensus the three social partners on the very important issues which were discussed at this Conference. Without a firm commitment to tripartism, such dialogue and compromise would not have been possible.

It is also true that this fruitful and happy outcome has been made possible thanks to the patience, long experience and skills of our President and the Chairpersons of the various committees, and I wish to convey my thanks and appreciation to my fellow Vice-Presidents, Mr. Ould Sidi and Mr. Matinchev, for their cooperation and team spirit.

This session of the Conference also emphasized the relevance and importance of the ILO's international labour standards and particularly we need to pursue its work further in this field. The newly adopted Convention concerning part-time work was long overdue and it constitutes a timely addition to the existing international labour code of the ILO. The Convention gives hope to hundreds of thousands of part-time workers all over the world. It addresses an issue of major importance to all workers and particularly women workers. It has been written in a language and in a manner which makes it easily ratifiable. I therefore hope that it will be ratified by many countries in a short period of time.

Furthermore, the work on safety and health in mines has made significant progress and we can reasonably expect that this would lead to the adoption of further instruments. Here, too, the subject is of vital importance to a large number of workers in this sector who need adequate protection.

It is worth mentioning the broad discussions which took place on the role of private employment agencies in the functioning of labour markets. In this area also, we can expect a revision of the Fee-Charging Employment Agencies Convention (Revised), 1949 (No. 9) taking into account the realities and developments in the world labour market.

Standard setting is one of the most important activities of the ILO, but without proper supervision the system would not be effective. This is what leads me to commend the work done this year by the Committee of Experts and the Committee on the Application of Standards particularly for their major contribution to the promotion and application of ILO standards, particularly on two basic ILO Conventions: Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organize Convention, 1948 (No. 87) and the Right to Organize and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98). The supervisory mechanisms of the ILO are well-known internationally for their efficiency and competence. I wish to reiterate the full support of the Workers' group for the authority of experts and for the ILO's supervisory system.

Perhaps I should repeat that an important element of the ILO supervisory system is the analysis and examination of domestic labour legislations with a view to making recommendations to bring them into conformity with the ILO instruments. In this context, the General Survey of the Reports on the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organize Convention, 1948 (No. 87) and the Right to Organize and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), contained in report III (Part 4B), will serve as an important reference.

The adoption of the report of the Committee on Action against Apartheid and the resolution concerning post-apartheid South Africa constitutes a historic evet at this Conference. South Africa is now readmitted as a full-fledged Member of the ILO.

The Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa and Namibia has been repealed and consequently the Conference Committee on Action against Apartheid has been dissolved. The Workers' group can feel legitimately proud for having played a major role within the ILO in the struggle for the eradication of apartheid in South Africa. Let us hope that the ILO will continue to provide its support and assistance in the process of reconstruction and development of a free, democratic and non-racial South Africa.

I should also congratulate the Resolutions Committee on its performance this year. You will recall that last year, only one resolution was adopted and this time the Committee gave us two resolutions which are good and pertinent. I know that many people like myself will miss this Committee next year. As you know, the Resolutions Committee is where the priority concerns of the ILO constituents are determined and the pulse of the Conference taken. It would be interesting to see how the next session of the Conference will look like without the Resolutions Committee.

Finally, I sincerely believe that the debate at this year's session of the Conference has provided enough food for thought on the future orientation of the ILO. We look forward to examining the major policy issues and options in the Governing Body and to come out with recommendations which will enable the ILO to fulfil effectively its established mandate for the promotion of social justice and universal peace in the world. The work of this session provides important pointers for the role of the ILO in the twenty-first century. I wish to thank all delegates who have contributed to this important debate. I wish you all a safe journey back to your countries.

Original French: The SECRETARY-GENERAL – Mr.President, for many of the delegates here, your country, the United States of America, represents football country, soccer country to us. A few days ago, I read that the President of the International Football Association, Mr. Havelange, was having trouble with his referees.

I would suggest to all of you that you allow me to write to Mr. Havelange telling him that we have an excellent referee here with us, that he is finishing his work with us today and going back to the United States, and we feel that he would be perfectly capable, given the excellent way in which he has served as our President, of refereeing the World Cup finals.

But while waiting for Mr. Havelange to call him to this important post, I would like to present him with this symbol of service as a referee and as President of the International Labour Conference. I should just like to tell him that, if Mr. Havelange hires him for the cup final – and the Football Federation should be so lucky – he is not to use this to referee with.

The PRESIDENT – I will be happy to referee as long as the United States is not in the finals.

I want to thank all of you once again for the honour you have given me. I feel truly humbled. For a boy who grew up in a house with dirt floors, no electricity, no plumbing and an outdoor toilet, whose grandfather had only six years of schooling and whose great-grandparents were illiterate, this is indeed a high honour for me, something to which I neither aspired nor ever expected to achieve. I would like to take a few extra minutes this morning to speak to you, and I hope you bear with me – after all it will be 25 years again, I presume, before another Worker has the opportunity to sit up here, and I would like to try to leave a message.

I do want to give special mention to my three Vice-Presidents, who stood beside me and shared my duties with diligence and great distinction and discretion. I thank the Director-General of the International Labour Office and all the staff, whether they are working on the scene or behind the scenes, and I believe they have been working very hard behind the scenes, for the assistance they provided me and for their tireless efforts in making this Conference a success. Two days ago, I met with representatives of the ILO Staff Union and I was impressed with their dedication and sense of purpose for the great work of this Office.

I have done my best. If there are any deficiencies in my performance as your President, it is due to my own shortcomings and not, I repeat not, to any negative actions on your part. Rather, I say thanks to all of you for everything, for your kind words, support, cooperation and advice which have been invaluable to me in presiding over this historic Conference.

I will not summarize all the important events and accomplishments which have marked this session of the Conference. The Director-General has already done this yesterday with much more skill and diplomacy than I will ever be able to muster.

We have heard a lot of lofty phrases from our podium these past few weeks, phrases such as social justice and poverty alleviation. I would like to reduce just one of them to its lowest common denominator. What do words such as "poverty alleviation" mean in real, down-to-earth, human terms? I will tell you what it means. It means doing something for a Juan Morales who lives in a shanty made of tin and scrap wood. It is hotter than hell when it is dry, and it leaks like a sieve when it rains. There is no electricity, no running water, no amenities, a squat toilet out in the back alongside a ditch of polluted water where the family bathes and launders. The shack is crowded, but not nearly as much as it would be if five of their eight children had not died before they were two years of age due to malnutrition, infections and disease.

Like Juan himself, and his wife, none of their children have attended school. The children spend their days going through stinking, rotting piles of garbage looking for scraps of paper, or rags, or bits of plastic which they can sell.

Juan has not yet told his wife that he plans to sell their nine-year-old daughter into a life of prostitution the next time Auntie Maria comes to town looking for likely prospects to feed the ever-growing demands of the flesh trade. It is a pity, but life is hard and the price he receives, although small by our standards, will be more than he can earn in a year. He is sure his wife will agree.

Unfortunately, Juan is not alone. There are hundreds like him living in his village, thousands in towns across his country, tens of thousands in the largest cities, and literally millions around this world of ours.

In this setting, I think we can be very proud of the ILO and its accomplishments over the past 75 years. It has been a beacon to the world in the defence of human and worker rights. However, for it to make a practical impact on the lives of the millions of brothers and sisters of Juan Morales, the ILO has to be much more than a beacon. It also has to be willing to roll up its sleeves, get its hands dirty, and promote standards to the fullest extent possible, not only in the meeting rooms of our ministries of labour, but also in the homes and workplaces of Juan Morales and his extended family throughout the world.

Of course, this is an ambitious task. The International Labour Office cannot tackle it singlehanded. This Conference, and all of you sitting here today, represent our worldwide network of constituents, whom I call upon to be active partners in this task, not only in providing moral and material support to your International Labour Office, but also in committing yourselves and your organizations in your own respective countries to spearhead national programmes and policies to fight poverty.

I would like to draw a few conclusions and directions for future action based on what I have heard sitting behind this podium, and where I feel there is a broad consensus. This consensus should be the springboard for the difficult tasks that lie ahead. It should provide the incentive we will all need in confronting poverty and social exclusion, not only on a global scale but also in the backyards of all of us here today.

The first conclusion is that we all have our backyards. Very few of us can be triumphant in claiming to have solved social injustice, poverty and unemployment, which are problems which most of us have identified as our number one priorities. Our problems and our aspirations are therefore universal. Of course, social exclusion can take on very different forms in different countries. Racial discrimination, bonded labour, inequality of pay between men and women, inability of workers to organize themselves freely to defend their rights, unemployment, lack of access to health care, schooling and basic services, homelessness and street children: each one of us is familiar with one or more of these cases of social exclusion, irrespective of the level of development of the country from which we come.

This means that in an era of globalization and of revolution in communications and human migration, the so-called "developed" countries may have many lessons to learn from the so-called "developing" ones. Therefore, global solidarity is not only an ideal but also a practical imperative in an era in which no nation can claim to have found the right answers to poverty and social exclusion.

I have heard many of you say, whether you are Employers, Workers or Governments, from Africa, Asia, Europe or the Americas, that unemployment and poverty are the number one problems facing the world today and your own main preoccupations. They constitute a continuing danger for peace and prosperity, and these problems fall squarely within the ILO's mandate. Two weeks ago we heard the representative of the European Union tell us that 18 million people are out of work in the European Union alone. The ILO's Director-General tells us in his Report to the Conference that an estimated 30 per cent of the world's labour force is not productively employed. More than 120 million people are registered as unemployed, and some 700 million are underemployed.

I hope all of us, and not just those of us coming from the trade union movement, believe that employment is a basic human right. A welfare approach to employment creation is not only humiliating and expensive: it also just plain won't work! So, what will work?

To begin improving the living and working conditions of Juan Morales, we must move beyond the notion of social safety nets. The safety net catches those who fall between the cracks. However, do we have the resources necessary to build a safety net strong enough to catch all those who are falling, especially when the cracks are getting wider than the boards on which we stand? When we hear that Africa has more than 60 per cent of the urban labour force in the informal sector, and Africa has the world's highest rate of urbanization, are we able to provide a safety net big enough to catch this 60 per cent, and then base our employment policies on the remaining 40 per cent who are "lucky" enough to be employed in the formal sector? And I say "lucky" with a tinge of irony, for even in the formal sector conditions of employment are under assault.

Does the ILO now have the tools to make a real difference? The multidisciplinary teams have been set up to bring the ILO closer to its constituents, but do these teams have the depth of expertise, the direction and the resources to develop and demonstrate practical steps which can be taken to begin reversing the tide of unemployment, poverty and social exclusion? We must work together to make these MDTs fully operational, so that they can develop the capacity to manage effectively the innovative technical cooperation programmes that will be necessary if we are to have any hope of reversing the ominous trends which every day widen the gulf between the world's haves and have nots.

The worker is both the source and the beneficiary of all development. Therefore, in discussions on labour market flexibility, we should never forget that all development policies should be centred on the worker, and the term "flexibility" should not be just a euphemism for pushing workers around to meet the logic of impersonal economic forces. Flexibility should be in the service of workers. It should meet their needs, and not the opposite.

Another point of broad consensus is that the economic and social sides of development are in fact two sides of the same coin. Therefore, as the ILO strives to do fewer things better, we cannot afford to retreat from matters of economic policy, leaving these to the sole domain of partner institutions such as the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund. While the ILO must remain a partner, and not an adversary, of these institutions, we should also be prepared to defend our own unique tripartite perspective on questions of both economic and social policy.

This brings me to a further message I have heard from the podium. Whereas my compatriot from the Employers' group has spoken out strongly against global regulation, most speakers have warned against the possible negative consequences for both workers and the unemployed of a completely unbridled free market. I think most of us would agree that the fall of communism and the opening of free markets have not automatically led to increased prosperity and social justice in Eastern Europe, including the former Soviet Union. I think that most of us agree that free markets will not in and of themselves solve the problems of Juan Morales.

I also note that no speaker has advocated building a nation's comparative advantage in international trade on the basis of universally condemned practices such as child labour, bonded or prison labour, or the inability of workers and employers to organize themselves freely.

Those of us who advocate linking the most basic levels of social protection to international trade agreements, whether this is called a social clause or some other widely accepted term, are simply arguing that we should all speak loud and clear with one voice in all the international fora in which we participate.

This coming year, we will all work together for a renewal and reinforcement of the ILO, as called for by the Director-General. Many of us will either represent or be in contact with colleagues who represent our governments in the World Trade Organization and in the World Summit for Social Development.

Let us commit ourselves to defend in these fora the same ideals and policies which we have already supported and defended within the ILO. However, let us also commit ourselves to making recommendations which are realistic and which can, and will, be put into practice.

In conclusion, let us remind ourselves once again of the high cost of doing nothing to reverse the erosion of workers' acquired rights, of doing nothing to help the plight of the world's marginalized populations, of doing nothing to help Juan Morales get a job and to help his children go to school. Let us think of poverty, social injustice and unemployment as similar to pollution of the environment. If free markets cannot single- handedly solve the world's environmental crisis, why should we expect them to solve the equally dangerous problems of poverty and unemployment?

If I were a pessimist I dare say I would believe that on the 100th anniversary of the ILO, delegates to the 106th Session of the International Labour Conference will still be talking about growing poverty, bad working conditions in the informal sector, unemployment and social exclusion, while pointing out in their speeches how interesting and quaint it is that these were the same problems of concern in 1919, in 1944, in 1969 and in 1994. My friends, that simply isn't good enough.

But I'm an optimist. Why? Well, if I were not an optimist, I could not be a trade unionist. If I were not an optimist, I couldn't believe in this great Organization, the ILO. The principles and goals for which it stands have the capability to turn human misery into human history. If I were not an optimist, I couldn't dream and I, too, have a dream.

When this Organization meets for its centennial celebration, I see contingents of the more than 100 million bonded labourers, who are truly slaves, free from grinding poverty, able to provide for themselves and their families. I see contingents of the hundreds of millions of child labourers no longer denied their childhood and an education, standing on the threshold of making a positive contribution to society, all marching together down the aisles of this historic hall echoing the refrain of a great American heard from the United States to South Africa: "free at last, free at last, thank God Almighty, we are free at last".

I hate to give up this presidency, I must say. It is now my privilege to declare this 81st Session of the International Labour Conference closed. Godspeed, and have a safe trip home.

(The Conference adjourned sine die at 1.15 p.m.)

13	29	Left-hand column, fourth full paragraph, second line, should read "Employers' delegation" and not "Workers' delegation".
14	4	Left-hand column, second paragraph, the second sentence should read: "I have had the privilege to be able to spell out my own proposals and thoughts for the future more in detail in the anthology entitled Visions of the future of social justice which the Director-General has taken the initiative to compile for the ILO's 75-year jubilee." Third paragraph, seventh line, the sentence should read: "The ILO's activities should be demand driven and not supply driven." Last paragraph, second line, the words "the proposals" should be replaced by "our proposals".
16	9	Right-hand column, seventh full paragraph, the first sentence should read: "The full and proper use of this ILO machinery would not only ensure that appropriate world attention is drawn to the cases of discrimination and poor employment practices in the occupied territories, but it would render exceptional measures such as the current special sitting unnecessary in the future."
18	21	Right-hand column, fourth paragraph, third line, replace "Mr. Martin, the representative of the Director-General", by "Mr. Maupin, Legal Adviser of the ILO".
18	39	Right-hand column, second paragraph, seventh line, replace the words "a very different approach" by "different approach"; same paragraph, penultimate line, replace the words "a major reorganization on the way" by "a far-reaching functional change in the way". In the third paragraph, the end of the fifth sentence should read" – and I can find no reference to competition or trade anywhere in that Preamble or elsewhere". The beginning of the fourth paragraph should read: "I do not, at this point, wish to enter into a discussion as to whether these clauses are in any way inappropriate to achieve their commercial ...". Fifth paragraph, sixth line, the words "the ILO could be asked to play a role when cases of violation are identified" should be replaced by "the ILO could be asked to play an informative role as to where cases of violation are identified". Sixth paragraph, last sentence, should read "But I feel that once the discussion has been concluded, the issue could be closed as far as the ILO is concerned."

No.	Page
22	12	Right-hand column, third line, the words "newly independent" should be capitalized to read "Newly Independent". In the same column, first full paragraph, 16th line, the sentence should end after the word "landscape" and the word "and" should be deleted. A new sentence should then begin with "I". In the third full paragraph, fifth line, the words "at the Ministerial Level" should be inserted after "Meeting"; and the words "concerning labour markets" should be inserted after "flexibility".
23	7	The last sentence of paragraph 18 should be replaced as follows: "The Government member of Mexico reiterated her country's commitment to the ILO's standard-setting activity, both as concerns bargaining and the ratification and adjustment of international labour standards to specific situations. She expressed support for a Recommendation, rather than a Convention, pointing out that in order to bring the provisions of a Convention into conformity with national legislation, it would be necessary to carry out far-reaching constitutional and statutory reforms, which were not envisaged in Mexico at the moment. A Recommendation would give member States the possibility of applying measures of protection in accordance with their needs, as well as serve as an informal source for future adjustments to national law and practice."

CONVENTION CONCERNING PART-TIME WORK

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

Having been convened at Geneva by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, and having met in its 81st Session on 7 June 1994, and

Noting the relevance, for part-time workers, of the provisions of the Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951, the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958, and the Workers with Family Responsibilities Convention and Recommendation, 1981, and

Noting the relevance for these workers of the Employment Promotion and Protection against Unemployment Convention, 1988, and the Employment Policy (Supplementary Provisions) Recommendation, 1984, and

Recognizing the importance of productive and freely chosen employment for all workers, the economic importance of part-time work, the need for employment policies to take into account the role of part-time work in facilitating additional employment opportunities, and the need to ensure protection for part-time workers in the areas of access to employment, working conditions and social security, and

Having decided upon the adoption of certain proposals with regard to part-time work, which is the fourth item on the agenda of the session, and adopts this twenty-fourth day of June of the year one thousand nine hundred and ninety-four the following Convention, which may be cited as the Part-Time Work Convention, 1994:

Article 1

For the purposes of this Convention:

(a) the term "part-time worker" means an employed person whose normal hours of work are less than those of comparable full-time workers;

(b) the normal hours of work referred to in subparagraph (a) may be calculated weekly or on average over a given period of employment;

(c) the term "comparable full-time worker" refers to a full-time worker who:

- (i) has the same type of employment relationship;
- (ii) is engaged in the same or a similar type of work or occupation; and
- (iii) is employed in the same establishment or, when there is no comparable full-time worker in that establishment, in the same enterprise or, when there is no comparable full-time worker in that enterprise, in the same branch of activity, as the part-time worker concerned;

(d) full-time workers affected by partial unemployment, that is by a collective and temporary reduction in their normal hours of work for economic, technical or structural reasons, are not considered to be part-time workers.

Article 2

This Convention does not affect more favourable provisions applicable to part-time workers under other international labour Conventions.

CONVENTION CONCERNANT LE TRAVAIL À TEMPS PARTIEL

La Conférence générale de l'Organisation internationale du Travail,

Convoquée à Genève par le Conseil d'administration du Bureau international du Travail, et s'y étant réunie le 7 juin 1994, en sa quatre-vingt-unième session;

Notant la pertinence, pour les travailleurs à temps partiel, des dispositions de la convention sur l'égalité de rémunération, 1951, de la convention concernant la discrimination (emploi et profession), 1958, et de la convention et de la recommandation sur les travailleurs ayant des responsabilités familiales, 1981;

Notant aussi la pertinence, pour ces travailleurs, de la convention sur la promotion de l'emploi et la protection contre le chômage, 1988, et de la recommandation concernant la politique de l'emploi (dispositions complémentaires), 1984;

Reconnaissant l'importance que revêt pour l'ensemble des travailleurs un emploi productif et librement choisi, l'importance du travail à temps partiel pour l'économie, la nécessité pour les politiques de l'emploi de prendre en compte le rôle que joue le travail à temps partiel dans la création de possibilités d'emploi supplémentaires et la nécessité d'assurer la protection des travailleurs à temps partiel dans les domaines de l'accès à l'emploi, des conditions de travail et de la sécurité sociale;

Après avoir décidé d'adopter diverses propositions relatives au travail à temps partiel, question qui constitue le quatrième point à l'ordre du jour de la session;

Après avoir décidé que ces propositions prendraient la forme d'une convention internationale, adopte, ce vingt-quatrième jour de juin mil neuf cent quatre-vingt-quatorze, la convention ci-après, qui sera dénommée Convention sur le travail à temps partiel, 1994.

Article 1

Aux fins de la présente convention:

a) l'expression «travailleur à temps partiel» désigne un travailleur salarié dont la durée normale du travail est inférieure à celle des travailleurs à plein temps se trouvant dans une situation comparable;

b) la durée normale du travail visée à l'alinéa a) peut être calculée sur une base hebdomadaire ou en moyenne au cours d'une période d'emploi donnée;

c) l'expression «travailleur à plein temps se trouvant dans une situation comparable» se réfère à un travailleur à plein temps:

  i) ayant le même type de relation d'emploi;

  ii) effectuant le même type de travail, ou un type de travail similaire, ou exerçant le même type de profession, ou un type de profession similaire;

  iii) et employé dans le même établissement ou, en l'absence de travailleurs à plein temps se trouvant dans une situation comparable dans cet établissement, dans la même entreprise ou, en l'absence de travailleurs à plein temps se trouvant dans une situation comparable dans cette entreprise, dans la même branche d'activité,

que le travailleur à temps partiel visé;

d) les travailleurs à plein temps en chômage partiel, c'est-à-dire affectés par une réduction collective et temporaire de leur durée normale de travail pour des raisons économiques, techniques ou structurelles, ne sont pas considérés comme des travailleurs à temps partiel.

Article 2

La présente convention n'affecte pas les dispositions plus favorables applicables aux travailleurs à temps partiel en vertu d'autres conventions internationales du travail.

1. This Convention applies to all part-time workers, it being understood that a Member may, after consulting the representative organizations of employers and workers concerned, exclude wholly or partly from its scope particular categories of workers or of establishments when its application to them would raise particular problems of a substantial nature.

2. Each Member having ratified this Convention which avails itself of the possibility afforded in the preceding paragraph shall, in its reports on the application of the Convention under article 22 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organization, indicate any particular category of workers or of establishments thus excluded and the reasons why this exclusion was or is still judged necessary.

Article 4

Measures shall be taken to ensure that part-time workers receive the same protection as that accorded to comparable full-time workers in respect of:

(a) the right to organize, the right to bargain collectively and the right to act as workers' representatives;
(b) occupational safety and health;
(c) discrimination in employment and occupation.

Article 5

Measures appropriate to national law and practice shall be taken to ensure that part-time workers do not, solely because they work part time, receive a basic wage which, calculated proportionately on an hourly, performance-related, or piece-rate basis, is lower than the basic wage of comparable full-time workers, calculated according to the same method.

Article 6

Statutory social security schemes which are based on occupational activity shall be adapted so that part-time workers enjoy conditions equivalent to those of comparable full-time workers; these conditions may be determined in proportion to hours of work, contributions or earnings, or through other methods consistent with national law and practice.

Article 7

Measures shall be taken to ensure that part-time workers receive conditions equivalent to those of comparable full-time workers in the fields of:

(a) maternity protection;
(b) termination of employment;
(c) paid annual leave and paid public holidays; and
(d) sick leave,

it being understood that pecuniary entitlements may be determined in proportion to hours of work or earnings.

Article 8

1. Part-time workers whose hours of work or earnings are below specified thresholds may be excluded by a Member:

(a) from the scope of any of the statutory social security schemes referred to in Article 6, except in regard to employment injury benefits;

(b) from the scope of any of the measures taken in the fields covered by Article 7, except in regard to maternity protection measures other than those provided under statutory social security schemes.

1. La présente convention s'applique à tous les travailleurs à temps partiel, étant entendu qu'un Membre pourra, après consultation des organisations représentatives des employeurs et des travailleurs intéressés, exclure totalement ou partiellement de son champ d'application des catégories particulières de travailleurs ou d'établissements lorsque sa mise en œuvre à leur égard soulève des problèmes particuliers d'une importance non négligeable.

2. Tout Membre qui ratifie la présente convention et qui se prévaut de la possibilité offerte au paragraphe précédent doit, dans ses rapports sur l'application de la convention présentés au titre de l'article 22 de la Constitution de l'Organisation internationale du Travail, indiquer toute catégorie particulière de travailleurs ou d'établissements ainsi exclue et les raisons pour lesquelles cette exclusion a été ou reste jugée nécessaire.

Des mesures doivent être prises afin que les travailleurs à temps partiel reçoivent la même protection que celle dont bénéficient les travailleurs à plein temps se trouvant dans une situation comparable en ce qui concerne:

a) le droit d'organisation, le droit de négociation collective et celui d'agir en qualité de représentants des travailleurs;

b) la sécurité et la santé au travail;

c) la discrimination dans l'emploi et la profession.

Article 5

Des mesures appropriées à la législation et à la pratique nationales doivent être prises pour que les travailleurs à temps partiel ne perçoivent pas, au seul motif qu'ils travaillent à temps partiel, un salaire de base qui, calculé proportionnellement sur une base horaire, au rendement ou à la pièce, soit inférieur au salaire de base, calculé selon la même méthode, des travailleurs à plein temps se trouvant dans une situation comparable.

Article 6

Les régimes légaux de sécurité sociale qui sont liés à l'exercice d'une activité professionnelle doivent être adaptés de manière à ce que les travailleurs à temps partiel bénéficient de conditions équivalentes à celles des travailleurs à plein temps se trouvant dans une situation comparable; ces conditions pourront être déterminées à proportion de la durée du travail, des cotisations ou des gains ou par d'autres méthodes conformes à la législation et à la pratique nationales.

Article 7

Des mesures doivent être prises afin que les travailleurs à temps partiel bénéficient de conditions équivalentes à celles des travailleurs à plein temps se trouvant dans une situation comparable dans les domaines suivants:

a) la protection de la maternité;

b) la cessation de la relation de travail;

c) le congé annuel payé et les jours fériés payés;

d) le congé de maladie, étant entendu que les prestations pécuniaires pourront être déterminées à proportion de la durée du travail ou des gains.

Article 8

1. Les travailleurs à temps partiel dont la durée du travail ou les gains sont inférieurs à des seuils déterminés pourront être exclus par un Membre:

a) du champ d'application de l'un quelconque des régimes légaux de sécurité sociale visés à l'article 6, sauf s'il s'agit des prestations d'accidents du travail et de maladies professionnelles;

b) du champ d'application de l'une quelconque des mesures adoptées dans les domaines visés à l'article 7, à l'exception des mesures de protection de la maternité autres que celles qui sont prévues par des régimes légaux de sécurité sociale.

2. The thresholds referred to in paragraph 1 shall be sufficiently low as not to exclude an unduly large percentage of part-time workers.

3. A Member which avails itself of the possibility provided for in paragraph 1 above shall:

(a) periodically review the thresholds in force;

(b) in its reports on the application of the Convention under article 22 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organization, indicate the thresholds in force, the reasons therefor and whether consideration is being given to the progressive extension of protection to the workers excluded.

4. The most representative organizations of employers and workers shall be consulted on the establishment, review and revision of the thresholds referred to in this Article.

Article 9

1. Measures shall be taken to facilitate access to productive and freely chosen part-time work which meets the needs of both employers and workers, provided that the protection referred to in Articles 4 to 7 is ensured.

2. These measures shall include:

(a) the review of laws and regulations that may prevent or discourage recourse to or acceptance of part-time work;

(b) the use of employment services, where they exist, to identify and publicize possibilities for part-time work in their information and placement activities;

(c) special attention, in employment policies, to the needs and preferences of specific groups such as the unemployed, workers with family responsibilities, older workers, workers with disabilities and workers undergoing education or training.

3. These measures may also include research and dissemination of information on the degree to which part-time work responds to the economic and social aims of employers and workers.

Article 10

Where appropriate, measures shall be taken to ensure that transfer from full-time to part-time work or vice versa is voluntary, in accordance with national law and practice.

Article 11

The provisions of this Convention shall be implemented by laws or regulations, except in so far as effect is given to them by means of collective agreements or in any other manner consistent with national practice. The most representative organizations of employers and workers shall be consulted before any such laws or regulations are adopted.

Article 12

The formal ratifications of this Convention shall be communicated to the Director-General of the International Labour Office for registration.

Article 13

1. This Convention shall be binding only upon those Members of the International Labour Organization whose ratifications have been registered with the Director-General.

2. It shall come into force 12 months after the date on which the ratifications of two Members have been registered with the Director-General.

3. Thereafter, this Convention shall come into force for any Member 12 months after the date on which its ratification has been registered.

2. Les seuils mentionnés au paragraphe 1 doivent être suffisamment bas pour ne pas exclure un pourcentage indûment élevé de travailleurs à temps partiel.

3. Un Membre qui se prévaut de la possibilité prévue au paragraphe 1 ci-dessus doit:

a) revoir périodiquement les seuils en vigueur;

b) préciser, dans ses rapports sur l'application de la convention présentés au titre de l'article 22 de la Constitution de l'Organisation internationale du Travail, les seuils en vigueur et leurs raisons et indiquer s'il est envisagé d'étendre progressivement la protection aux travailleurs exclus.

4. Les organisations les plus représentatives des employeurs et des travailleurs doivent être consultées au sujet de la fixation, du réexamen et de la révision des seuils visés au présent article.

Article 9

1. Des mesures doivent être prises pour faciliter l'accès au travail à temps partiel productif et librement choisi qui réponde aux besoins tant des employeurs que des travailleurs sous réserve que la protection visée aux articles 4 à 7 ci-dessus soit assurée.

2. Ces mesures doivent comporter:

a) le réexamen des dispositions de la législation susceptibles d'empêcher ou de décourager le recours au travail à temps partiel ou l'acceptation de ce type de travail;

b) l'utilisation des services de l'emploi, lorsqu'il en existe, pour identifier et faire connaître les possibilités de travail à temps partiel au cours de leurs activités d'information et de placement;

c) une attention spéciale, dans le cadre des politiques de l'emploi, aux besoins et aux préférences de groupes spécifiques tels que les chômeurs, les travailleurs ayant des responsabilités familiales, les travailleurs âgés, les travailleurs handicapés et les travailleurs qui étudient ou sont en formation.

3. Ces mesures peuvent comprendre également des recherches et la diffusion d'informations sur la mesure dans laquelle le travail à temps partiel répond aux objectifs économiques et sociaux des employeurs et des travailleurs.

Dans les cas appropriés, des mesures doivent être prises afin que le transfert d'un travail à plein temps à un travail à temps partiel, ou vice versa, soit volontaire, conformément à la législation et à la pratique nationales.

Article 11

Les dispositions de la présente convention doivent être mises en œuvre par voie de législation, sauf dans la mesure où il leur est donné effet par voie de conventions collectives ou par tout autre moyen conforme à la pratique nationale. Les organisations les plus représentatives des employeurs et des travailleurs doivent être consultées préalablement à l'adoption d'une telle législation.

Article 12

Les ratifications formelles de la présente convention seront communiquées au Directeur général du Bureau international du Travail et par lui enregistrées.

Article 13

1. La présente convention ne liera que les Membres de l'Organisation internationale du Travail dont la ratification aura été enregistrée par le Directeur général.

2. Elle entrera en vigueur douze mois après que les ratifications de deux Membres auront été enregistrées par le Directeur général.

3. Par la suite, cette convention entrera en vigueur pour chaque Membre douze mois après la date où sa ratification aura été enregistrée.

Article 14

1. A Member which has ratified this Convention may denounce it after the expiration of ten years from the date on which the Convention first comes into force, by an act communicated to the Director-General of the International Labour Office for registration. Such denunciation shall not take effect until one year after the date on which it is registered.

2. Each Member which has ratified this Convention and which does not, within the year following the expiration of the period of ten years mentioned in the preceding paragraph, exercise the right of denunciation provided for in this Article, will be bound for another period of ten years and, thereafter, may denounce this Convention at the expiration of each period of ten years under the terms provided for in this Article.

1. The Director-General of the International Labour Office shall notify all Members of the International Labour Organization of the registration of all ratifications and denunciations communicated to him by the Members of the Organization.

2. When notifying the Members of the Organization of the registration of the second ratification communicated to him, the Director-General shall draw the attention of the Members of the Organization to the date upon which the Convention will come into force.

Article 16

The Director-General of the International Labour Office shall communicate to the Secretary-General of the United Nations for registration in accordance with Article 102 of the Charter of the United Nations full particulars of all ratifications and acts of denunciations registered by him in accordance with the provisions of the preceding Articles.

Article 17

At such times as it may consider necessary, the Governing Body of the International Labour Office shall present to the General Conference a report on the working of this Convention and shall examine the desirability of placing on the agenda of the Conference the question of its revision in whole or in part.

Article 18

1. Should the Conference adopt a new Convention revising this Convention in whole or in part, then, unless the new Convention otherwise provides–

(a) the ratification by a Member of the new revising Convention shall ipso jure involve the immediate denunciation of this Convention, notwithstanding the provisions of Article 14 above, if and when the new revising Convention shall have come into force;

(b) as from the date when the new revising Convention comes into force this Convention shall cease to be open to ratification by the Members.

2. This Convention shall in any case remain in force in its actual form and content for those Members which have ratified it but have not ratified the revising Convention.

Article 19

The English and French versions of the text of this Convention are equally authoritative.

Article 14

1. Tout Membre ayant ratifié la présente convention peut la dénoncer à l'expiration d'une période de dix années après la date de la mise en vigueur initiale de la convention, par un acte communiqué au Directeur général du Bureau international du Travail et par lui enregistré. La dénonciation ne prendra effet qu'une année après avoir été enregistrée.

2. Tout Membre ayant ratifié la présente convention qui, dans le délai d'une année après l'expiration de la période de dix années mentionnée au paragraphe précédent, ne fera pas usage de la faculté de dénonciation prévue par le présent article sera lié pour une nouvelle période de dix années et, par la suite, pourra dénoncer la présente convention à l'expiration de chaque période de dix années dans les conditions prévues au présent article.

1. Le Directeur général du Bureau international du Travail notifiera à tous les Membres de l'Organisation internationale du Travail l'enregistrement de toutes les ratifications et dénonciations qui lui seront communiquées par les Membres de l'Organisation.

2. En notifiant aux Membres de l'Organisation l'enregistrement de la deuxième ratification qui lui aura été communiquée, le Directeur général appellera l'attention des Membres de l'Organisation sur la date à laquelle la présente convention entrera en vigueur.

Le Directeur général du Bureau international du Travail communiquera au Secrétaire général des Nations Unies, aux fins d'enregistrement, conformément à l'article 102 de la Charte des Nations Unies, des renseignements complets au sujet de toutes ratifications et de tous actes de dénonciation qu'il aura enregistrés conformément aux articles précédents.

Article 17

Chaque fois qu'il le jugera nécessaire, le Conseil d'administration du Bureau international du Travail présentera à la Conférence générale un rapport sur l'application de la présente convention et examinera s'il y a lieu d'inscrire à l'ordre du jour de la Conférence la question de sa révision totale ou partielle.

Article 18

1. Au cas où la Conférence adopterait une nouvelle convention portant révision totale ou partielle de la présente convention, et à moins que la nouvelle convention ne dispose autrement:

a) la ratification par un Membre de la nouvelle convention portant révision entraînerait de plein droit, nonobstant l'article 14 ci-dessus, dénonciation immédiate de la présente convention, sous réserve que la nouvelle convention portant révision soit entrée en vigueur;

b) à partir de la date de l'entrée en vigueur de la nouvelle convention portant révision, la présente convention cesserait d'être ouverte à la ratification des Membres.

2. La présente convention demeurerait en tout cas en vigueur dans sa forme et teneur pour les Membres qui l'auraient ratifiée et qui ne ratifieraient pas la convention portant révision.

Les versions française et anglaise du texte de la présente convention font également foi.

RECOMMENDATION CONCERNING PART-TIME WORK

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

Having been convened at Geneva by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, and having met in its 81st Session on 7 June 1994, and

Having decided upon the adoption of certain proposals with regard to part-time work, which is the fourth item on the agenda of the session, and

Having determined that these proposals shall take the form of a Recommendation supplementing the Part-Time Work Convention, 1994;

adopts this twenty-fourth day of June of the year one thousand nine hundred and ninety-four the following Recommendation, which may be cited as the Part-Time Work Recommendation, 1994:

1. The provisions of this Recommendation should be considered in conjunction with those of the Part-Time Work Convention, 1994 (hereafter referred to as "the Convention").

2. For the purposes of this Recommendation:

(a) the term "part-time worker" means an employed person whose normal hours of work are less than those of comparable full-time workers;

(b) the normal hours of work referred to in clause (a) may be calculated weekly or on average over a given period of employment;

(c) the term "comparable full-time worker" refers to a full-time worker who:

- (i) has the same type of employment relationship;
- (ii) is engaged in the same or a similar type of work or occupation; and
- (iii) is employed in the same establishment or, when there is no comparable full-time worker in that establishment, in the same enterprise or, when there is no comparable full-time worker in that enterprise, in the same branch of activity,

as the part-time worker concerned;

(d) full-time workers affected by partial unemployment, that is by a collective and temporary reduction in their normal hours of work for economic, technical or structural reasons, are not considered to be part-time workers.

3. This Recommendation applies to all part-time workers.

4. In accordance with national law and practice, employers should consult the representatives of the workers concerned on the introduction or extension of part-time work on a broad scale, on the rules and procedures applying to such work and on the protective and promotional measures that may be appropriate.

5. Part-time workers should be informed of their specific conditions of employment in writing or by any other means consistent with national law and practice.

6. The adaptations to be made in accordance with Article 6 of the Convention to statutory social security schemes which are based on occupational activity should aim at:

(a) if appropriate, progressively reducing threshold requirements based on earnings or hours of work as a condition for coverage by these schemes;

(b) as appropriate, granting to part-time workers minimum or flat-rate benefits, in particular old-age, sickness, invalidity and maternity benefits, as well as family allowances;

RECOMMANDATION CONCERNANT LE TRAVAIL À TEMPS PARTIEL

La Conférence générale de l'Organisation internationale du Travail,

Convoquée à Genève par le Conseil d'administration du Bureau international du Travail, et s'y étant réunie le 7 juin 1994, en sa quatre-vingt-unième session;

Après avoir décidé d'adopter diverses propositions relatives au travail à temps partiel, question qui constitue le quatrième point à l'ordre du jour de la session;

Après avoir décidé que ces propositions prendraient la forme d'une recommandation complétant la convention sur le travail à temps partiel, 1994, adopte, ce vingt-quatrième jour de juin mil neuf cent quatre-vingt-quatorze, la recommandation ci-après, qui sera dénommée Recommandation sur le travail à temps partiel, 1994.

1. Les dispositions de la présente recommandation devraient être considérées concurremment avec celles de la convention sur le travail à temps partiel, 1994 (ci-après dénommée la convention).

2. Aux fins de la présente recommandation:

a) l'expression «travailleur à temps partiel» désigne un travailleur salarié dont la durée normale du travail est inférieure à celle des travailleurs à plein temps se trouvant dans une situation comparable;

b) la durée normale du travail visée à l'alinéa a) peut être calculée sur une base hebdomadaire ou en moyenne au cours d'une période d'emploi donnée;

c) l'expression «travailleur à plein temps se trouvant dans une situation comparable» se réfère à un travailleur à plein temps:

- i) ayant le même type de relation d'emploi;
- ii) effectuant le même type de travail, ou un type de travail similaire, ou exerçant le même type de profession, ou un type de profession similaire;
- iii) et employé dans le même établissement ou, en l'absence de travailleurs à plein temps se trouvant dans une situation comparable dans cet établissement, dans la même entreprise ou, en l'absence de travailleurs à plein temps se trouvant dans une situation comparable dans cette entreprise, dans la même branche d'activité, que le travailleur à temps partiel visé;

d) les travailleurs à plein temps en chômage partiel, c'est-à-dire affectés par une réduction collective et temporaire de leur durée normale de travail pour des raisons économiques, techniques ou structurelles, ne sont pas considérés comme des travailleurs à temps partiel.

3. La présente recommandation s'applique à tous les travailleurs à temps partiel.

4. Conformément à la législation et à la pratique nationales, l'employeur devrait consulter les représentants des travailleurs concernés au sujet de l'introduction ou de l'extension, sur une large échelle, du travail à temps partiel, au sujet des règles et procédures applicables à ce type de travail ainsi qu'au sujet des mesures protectrices et promotionnelles qui peuvent être appropriées.

5. Les travailleurs à temps partiel devraient être informés de leurs conditions d'emploi spécifiques par écrit ou par tout autre moyen conforme à la législation et à la pratique nationales.

6. Les adaptations à apporter, conformément à l'article 6 de la convention, aux régimes légaux de sécurité sociale liés à l'exercice d'une activité professionnelle devraient tendre à:

a) abaisser progressivement, s'il y a lieu, les exigences relatives aux seuils de gains ou de durée du travail qui permettent l'accès à ces régimes;

b) assurer aux travailleurs à temps partiel, s'il y a lieu, le bénéfice des prestations minimales ou forfaitaires prévues, notamment en matière de vieillesse, de maladie, d'invalidité et de maternité ainsi qu'en matière d'allocations familiales;

(c) accepting in principle that part-time workers whose employment has come to an end or been suspended and who are seeking only part-time employment meet the condition of availability for work required for the payment of unemployment benefits;

(d) reducing the risk that part-time workers may be penalized by schemes which:

  (i) subject the right to benefits to a qualifying period, expressed in terms of periods of contribution, of insurance or of employment during a given reference period; or

  (ii) fix the amount of benefits by reference both to the average of former earnings and to the length of the periods of contribution, of insurance or of employment.

7. (1) Where appropriate, threshold requirements for access to coverage under private occupational schemes which supplement or replace statutory social security schemes should be progressively reduced to allow part-time workers to be covered as widely as possible.

(2) Part-time workers should be protected by such schemes under conditions equivalent to those of comparable full-time workers. Where appropriate, these conditions may be determined in proportion to hours of work, contributions or earnings.

8. (1) As appropriate, threshold requirements based on hours of work or earnings as specified under Article 8 of the Convention in the fields referred to in its Article 7 should be progressively reduced.

(2) The periods of service required as a condition for protection in the fields referred to in Article 7 of the Convention should not be longer for part-time workers than for comparable full-time workers.

9. Where part-time workers have more than one job, their total hours of work, contributions or earnings should be taken into account in determining whether they meet threshold requirements in statutory social security schemes which are based on occupational activity.

10. Part-time workers should benefit on an equitable basis from financial compensation, additional to basic wages, which is received by comparable full-time workers.

11. All appropriate measures should be taken to ensure that as far as practicable part-time workers have access on an equitable basis to the welfare facilities and social services of the establishment concerned; these facilities and services should, to the extent possible, be adapted to take into account the needs of part-time workers.

12. (1) The number and scheduling of hours of work of part-time workers should be established taking into account the interests of the worker as well as the needs of the establishment.

(2) As far as possible, changes in the agreed work schedule and work beyond scheduled hours should be subject to restrictions and to prior notice.

(3) The system of compensation for work beyond the agreed work schedule should be subject to negotiations in accordance with national law and practice.

13. In accordance with national law and practice, part-time workers should have access on an equitable basis, and as far as possible under equivalent conditions, to all forms of leave available to comparable full-time workers, in particular paid educational leave, parental leave and leave in cases of illness of a child or another member of a worker's immediate family.

14. Where appropriate, the same rules should apply to part-time workers as to comparable full-time workers with respect to scheduling of annual leave and work on customary rest days and public holidays.

c) admettre en principe que les travailleurs à temps partiel dont la relation de travail a pris fin ou a été suspendue et qui sont demandeurs seulement d'un emploi à temps partiel remplissent la condition de disponibilité pour le travail requise pour le versement d'allocations de chômage;

d) réduire le risque que les travailleurs à temps partiel soient pénalisés par des régimes qui:

i) subordonnent le droit aux prestations à une période déterminée de cotisation, d'assurance ou d'emploi au cours d'une période de référence donnée; ou ii) fixent le montant des prestations par référence à la fois à la moyenne des gains antérieurs et à la durée des périodes de cotisation, d'assurance ou d'emploi.

7. (1) Dans les cas appropriés, les exigences relatives aux seuils d'accès à des régimes professionnels privés complétant ou remplaçant des régimes légaux de sécurité sociale devraient être progressivement abaissées pour permettre la couverture la plus large possible des travailleurs à temps partiel.

(2) Les travailleurs à temps partiel devraient bénéficier dans ces régimes de conditions équivalentes à celles des travailleurs à plein temps se trouvant dans une situation comparable; selon le cas, ces conditions pourraient être déterminées à proportion de la durée du travail, des cotisations ou des gains.

12. (1) Le nombre et l'aménagement des heures de travail des travailleurs à temps partiel devraient être déterminés en tenant compte à la fois des intérêts du travailleur et des besoins de l'établissement.

(2) Autant que possible, les modifications ou les dépassements de l'horaire de travail convenu devraient faire l'objet de restrictions et d'un préavis.

(3) Le système des compensations à accorder en cas de dépassement de l'horaire convenu devrait faire l'objet de négociations, conformément à la législation et à la pratique nationales.

13. Conformément à la législation et à la pratique nationales, les travailleurs à temps partiel devraient avoir accès sur une base équitable, et autant que possible dans des conditions équivalentes, à tous les types de congés octroyés aux travailleurs à plein temps se trouvant dans une situation comparable, notamment au congé-éducation payé, au congé parental et au congé en cas de maladie d'un enfant ou d'un autre membre de la famille directe du travailleur.

14. Les mêmes règles devraient, s'il y a lieu, s'appliquer aux travailleurs à temps partiel et aux travailleurs à plein temps se trouvant dans une situation comparable en ce qui concerne les dates des congés annuels et le travail effectué au cours d'un jour de repos habituel ou d'un jour férié.

15. Where appropriate, measures should be taken to overcome specific constraints on the access of part-time workers to training, career opportunities and occupational mobility.

16. Provisions of statutory social security schemes based on occupational activity that may discourage recourse to or acceptance of part-time work should be adapted, in particular those which:

(a) result in proportionately higher contributions for part-time workers unless these are justified by corresponding proportionately higher benefits;

(b) without reasonable grounds, significantly reduce the unemployment benefits of unemployed workers who temporarily accept part-time work;

(c) overemphasize, in the calculation of old-age benefits, the reduced income from part-time work undertaken solely during the period preceding retirement.

17. Measures should be considered by employers to facilitate access to part-time work at all levels of the enterprise, including skilled and managerial positions where appropriate.

18. (1) Where appropriate, employers should give consideration to:

(a) requests by workers for transfer from full-time to part-time work that becomes available in the enterprise; and

(b) requests by workers for transfer from part-time to full-time work that becomes available in the enterprise.

(2) Employers should provide timely information to the workers on the availability of part-time and full-time positions in the establishment, in order to facilitate transfers from full-time to part-time work or vice versa.

19. A worker's refusal to transfer from full-time to part-time work or vice versa should not in itself constitute a valid reason for termination of employment, without prejudice to termination, in accordance with national law and practice, for other reasons such as may arise from the operational requirements of the establishment concerned.

20. Where national or establishment-level conditions permit, workers should be enabled to transfer to part-time work in justified cases, such as pregnancy or the need to care for a young child or a disabled or sick member of a worker's immediate family, and subsequently to return to full-time work.

21. Where obligations on employers depend on the number of the workers they employ, part-time workers should be counted as full-time workers. Nevertheless, where appropriate, part-time workers may be counted proportionately to their hours of work, it being understood that where such obligations refer to the protection mentioned in Article 4 of the Convention, they should be counted as full-time workers.

22. Information should be disseminated on the protective measures that apply to part-time work and on practical arrangements for various part-time work schemes.

15. Des mesures devraient être prises, s'il y a lieu, pour surmonter les contraintes spécifiques que rencontrent les travailleurs à temps partiel en ce qui concerne l'accès à la formation, la progression et la mobilité professionnelles.

16. Les dispositions des régimes légaux de sécurité sociale liés à l'exercice d'une activité professionnelle qui sont de nature à décourager le recours au travail à temps partiel ou son acceptation devraient être adaptées, en particulier celles qui:

a) ont pour résultat d'assujettir les travailleurs à temps partiel à des cotisations proportionnellement plus élevées, à moins que celles-ci ne soient justifiées par des prestations correspondantes proportionnellement plus élevées;

b) réduisent sensiblement, sans motif raisonnable, les allocations de chômage versées aux chômeurs qui acceptent temporairement un travail à temps partiel;

c) donnent trop d'importance, dans le calcul des prestations de vieillesse, au revenu réduit résultant du travail à temps partiel effectué seulement durant la période qui précède la retraite.

17. Les employeurs devraient envisager des mesures visant à faciliter l'accès au travail à temps partiel à tous les niveaux de l'entreprise, y compris à des postes qualifiés et à des postes de direction lorsque cela est approprié.

18. (1) Les employeurs devraient, s'il y a lieu, prendre en considération:

a) les demandes de transfert des travailleurs à plein temps à un travail à temps partiel qui devient disponible dans l'entreprise;

b) les demandes de transfert des travailleurs à temps partiel à un travail à plein temps qui devient disponible dans l'entreprise.

(2) Les employeurs devraient, en temps opportun, fournir aux travailleurs des informations sur les postes à temps partiel et à plein temps disponibles dans l'établissement de façon à faciliter les transferts d'un travail à plein temps à un travail à temps partiel ou vice versa.

19. Le refus d'un travailleur d'être transféré d'un travail à plein temps à un travail à temps partiel, ou vice versa, ne devrait pas en tant que tel constituer un motif valable de licenciement, sans préjudice de la possibilité de procéder, conformément à la législation et à la pratique nationales, à des licenciements pour d'autres raisons telles que celles qui peuvent résulter des nécessités du fonctionnement de l'établissement considéré.

20. Lorsque les conditions nationales ou la situation de l'établissement le permettent, le transfert d'un travailleur à un travail à temps partiel dans des cas justifiés, comme une grossesse ou la nécessité de prendre soin d'un jeune enfant ou d'un membre handicapé ou malade de sa famille directe, ainsi que son retour ultérieur à un travail à plein temps devraient être rendus possibles s'il le demande.

22. Des informations devraient être diffusées sur les mesures protectrices qui s'appliquent au travail à temps partiel ainsi que sur les modalités pratiques des diverses formes de travail à temps partiel.

RESOLUTIONS ADOPTED BY THE CONFERENCE

I

Resolution to place on the agenda of the next ordinary session of the Conference an item entitled: "Safety and health in mines"[1]

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

Having adopted the report of the Committee appointed to consider the fifth item on the agenda,

Having in particular approved as general conclusions, with a view to the consultation of Governments, proposals for a Convention and a Recommendation concerning safety and health in mines;

Decides that an item entitled "Safety and health in mines" shall be included in the agenda of its next ordinary session for second discussion with a view to the adoption of a Convention and a Recommendation.

II

Resolution concerning post-apartheid South Africa[2]

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

Acclaiming the holding of the first free and democratic elections in the Republic of South Africa from 26 to 28 April 1994, resulting in the installation of a government of national unity, and the unanimous election on 9 May 1994 of Mr. Nelson Mandela as President of the Republic of South Africa,

Welcoming the readmission of South Africa as a Member of the International Labour Organization,

Noting with satisfaction the intention expressed by the Government of South Africa to recommend the immediate ratification of the ILO Conventions on freedom of association, collective bargaining, discrimination and forced labour,

Paying tribute to the important role played by the ILO and its constituents in the long and arduous struggle for the dismantling of apartheid,

Noting the decision taken by the ILO Governing Body at its 258th Session (November 1993) to suspend the application of the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid, and to adopt a plan of action on assistance to South Africa in the transition to full democracy and in overcoming the effects of apartheid,

Noting further the resolution concerning South Africa adopted by the Eighth African Regional Conference of the ILO in Mauritius from 19 to 26 January 1994,

Conscious that the legacy of apartheid will take many years to eradicate and that vast resources will be required to provide for basic needs and to promote equality for all the people in South Africa,

Noting that technical assistance to South Africa for the purpose of overcoming the legacy of apartheid must be developed in consultation with the tripartite constituents in South Africa, and will be provided at their request, jointly or individually,

Underlining the need for the ILO to develop, in consultation with the tripartite constituents of South Africa, a programme of action aimed at assisting in the removal of the inherent and deep-seated inequalities in the structures of South African society,

[2] Adopted on 22 June 1994.

Recognizing that the democratic exigencies of the transformation process from apartheid to a free, united and democratic society place a heavy responsibility on the shoulders of the tripartite South African social partners in the rebuilding and development of the country,

Convinced of the urgent need for the international community to commit itself to support fully the process of reconstruction and development in South Africa as that country enters the first stage of the post-apartheid era,

Considering that the recent political democratic developments have paved the way for the full respect of freedom and dignity of all human beings in South Africa, irrespective of race, creed or sex;

1. Rescinds forthwith the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa adopted by the International Labour Conference on 8 July 1964 and revised on 18 June 1981, 16 June 1988 and 20 June 1991, and consequently decides to dissolve forthwith the Conference Committee on Action against Apartheid.

2. Invites the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to instruct the Director-General:

(a) to adapt, in consultation with the tripartite constituents in South Africa, the plan of action approved by the Governing Body at its 258th Session (November 1993) to the social and economic development needs of post-apartheid South Africa, with special attention, inter alia, to the following:
  - the promotion of trade union and human rights;
  - capacity-building for employers' and workers' organizations;
  - employment creation;
  - promotion of small and medium-sized enterprises;
  - reform and restructuring of labour market institutions and labour administration;
  - labour relations and collective bargaining;
  - the effective use of all factors of production;
  - improvement of labour legislation and upgrading of labour standards;
  - improvement of working and living conditions in the rural areas and for farmworkers;
  - education and training, in particular vocational training;
  - human resources development and management training;
  - promotion of equality of opportunity and treatment; and
  - occupational health and safety;

(b) to consult with the South African Government and employers' and workers' organizations to ensure that all appropriate action is taken to bring about the implementation of the ILO plan of action, and to report at regular intervals to the Governing Body on its follow-up;

(c) to coordinate with the agencies of the United Nations system in the planning and execution of programmes of socio-economic assistance to South Africa, particularly in the areas of human resources development, entrepreneurship development, social protection, health, housing, education, employment, promotion of equality and other basic needs;

(d) to encourage the Government of South Africa and the employers' and workers' organizations to implement the principles laid down in the ILO Tripartite Declaration of Principles concerning Multinational Enterprises and Social Policy to attract new investment;

(e) to provide the necessary support and assistance for the strengthening of tripartite structures, and of independent, strong and non-racial employers' and workers' organizations;

(f) to provide the necessary support and assistance to the tripartite constituents in South Africa to assist them in the adoption of labour legislation and other measures which are compatible with international labour standards, and to allow them to consider ratification of appropriate Conventions; in particular, to assist them to comply with those recommendations of the Fact-Finding and Conciliation Commission on Freedom of Association concerning South Africa which have not yet been implemented, in accordance with the conclusions and recommendations of the Governing Body Committee on Freedom of Association.

3. Invites the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to call upon member States:

(a) to continue to support South Africa in its efforts for the total elimination of the consequences of apartheid; and

(b) to cooperate with and provide the necessary resources to the ILO in the implementation of the plan of action for technical assistance aimed at the social reconstruction and the long-term economic development of post-apartheid South Africa, through the regular budget, and from the international financial institutions of the United Nations system, and appropriate regional organizations, and from multi-bilateral donors.

III

Resolution concerning the 75th anniversary of the ILO and its future orientation[1]

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

On the occasion of the 75th anniversary of the International Labour Organization and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia,

Reaffirming the principles and fundamental values upon which the ILO was founded and which retain their relevance in the world today, including the promotion of social justice as the basis of universal peace,

Reaffirming also that because of its mandate and tripartite structure, the ILO has a unique role to play within the UN system,

Noting the particular importance of ILO Conventions covering fundamental rights, including Conventions Nos. 87, 98, 100, 29 and 105, and 111,

Mindful of the provisions contained in paragraph 3 of article 19 of the ILO Constitution,

Recognizing that the world has undergone considerable social and economic changes in recent years and anticipating that these will continue and will have varying effects on different countries,

Considering also that all institutions and structures need to be reviewed from time to time and where necessary strengthened, in order to ensure that their activities remain relevant to the needs of their members in a changing environment,

Acknowledging that structural change profoundly affects the world of work which requires the ILO efficiently to pursue its mandate and objectives concerning social justice, including the promotion of full, freely chosen and productive employment and the continued enhancement of working conditions,

Noting that the Governing Body of the ILO has already taken steps to improve the functioning of the International Labour Conference and the regional conferences, and to improve its own methods of work,

Thanking the Director-General for his Report to the current Conference entitled Defending values, promoting change – Social justice in a global economy: An ILO agenda, and taking note of the ideas and proposals it contains on the ILO's future orientation and activities of the ILO,

Further noting with interest the views expressed in the debate at the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference, as well as the recent contributions of several governments and of the social partners in the ILO to the discussion of the ILO's future;

1. Calls upon member States, and employers' and workers' organizations to reaffirm the principles and fundamental values upon which the ILO was founded and to contribute to a strengthening, where necessary, of the ILO's policy-making structures.

[1] Adopted on 22 June 1994.

2. Encourages also member States, and employers' and workers' organizations, to work together with a view to a renewal of the means of action of the ILO, and with a view to improving and optimizing the benefits it offers to its constituents in the light of changes in the world.

3. Requests the Director-General, in the light of the views expressed in the debate on his report to the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference, to present his views on the options available and to facilitate the discussion of these options by the Governing Body.

4. Requests the Governing Body of the International Labour Office:

(a) to examine the ideas and proposals of the Director-General with a view to revitalizing further the ILO, adapting its means of action to the changing world environment and increasing its effectiveness;

(b) to keep the Conference informed of the outcome.

IV

Resolution concerning the World Summit for Social Development[1]

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

Welcoming the convening by the United Nations General Assembly of the World Summit for Social Development in Denmark in 1995,

Considering the vital importance of peace, economic growth and social justice as the essential components necessary for social development,

Underlining the critical importance for the expansion of full, freely chosen and productive employment, reduction of unemployment, reduction and elimination of poverty and promotion of social integration, which have been chosen as the Summit's core issues,

Considering that the social and living conditions of people become particularly vulnerable during periods of profound structural change,

Convinced that economic efficiency and growth, and their interaction with adequate social protection, are important prerequisites for successful national development, and that economic reforms should also lead to sustainable social progress,

Mindful of the need to address the social consequences that may arise from structural adjustment policies including those promoted by the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank,

Recognizing the importance of international cooperation to support and complement national efforts to promote social development,

Recognizing the urgent need for a major initiative by the international community to tackle global social problems, and the opportunity that the Summit offers for the preparation of an appropriate comprehensive programme of action for the United Nations system,

Considering that issues to be examined by the Summit are central to the mandate and the competence of the ILO,

Considering therefore that the ILO has a primary responsibility and role to play in the preparation and conduct of the Summit and in the consideration and implementation of the conclusions which fall within its competence,

Stressing the need for appropriate tripartite inputs at all stages of the Summit process,

Also stressing the importance of the participation of workers' and employers' organizations, as appropriate, in the development of policies for economic growth and employment generation which will contribute to the strengthening of social protection systems, especially for the most vulnerable groups of the populations,

Noting the work of the Governing Body Working Party on the World Summit for Social Development and the inputs by the ILO Secretariat to the Summit preparation,

[1] Adopted on 22 June 1994.

Also noting that discussions took place at the Informal Tripartite Meeting at the Ministerial Level on Employment held on 10 June 1994 on issues to be addressed in connection with the Summit;

1. Invites all member States, and where appropriate, workers' and employers' organizations:

(a) to prepare for the World Summit for Social Development taking into consideration the competence, mandate and work of the ILO;

(b) to adopt and implement a declaration and a programme of action which should effectively address the issues of expansion of productive employment and reduction of unemployment, reduction and elimination of poverty and promotion of social integration;

(c) to promote the appropriate involvement of employers' and workers' organizations in the preparations for, conduct of, and follow-up to the Summit by:

  (i) involving employers' and workers' organizations in the national preparations for the Summit;

  (ii) considering including representatives of employers' and workers' organizations as advisers in the national delegations to the Summit;

  (iii) considering the practical arrangements for an active participation by the representatives of employers' and workers' organizations at the Summit;

(d) to recognize the primary competence of the ILO regarding core themes in the preparation for, conduct of and follow-up to the Summit;

(e) to strengthen the active participation of workers' and employers' organizations in the formulation of follow-up action to deal with the issues arising out of the Summit.

2. Invites the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to instruct the Director-General:

(a) to continue to make the necessary provisions for a full ILO input to the Summit process;

(b) to take all opportunities to promote tripartite inputs to that process;

(c) to take fully into account the need for the ILO to play a leading role in the follow-up to the Summit when preparing the programme and budget proposals for 1996-97 and in convening the second High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment;

(d) to continue, in this context, to address the problems of structural adjustment, bearing in mind the persistent problems of developing countries, and especially the particular needs of the least developed countries, as well as the problems of countries in transition to a market economy.

V

Resolution concerning the role of private employment agencies in the functioning of labour markets[1]

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization, meeting at its 81st Session (1994),

Having undertaken a comprehensive review of the functions and practices of employment agencies on the basis of Report VI entitled "The role of private employment agencies in the functioning of labour markets",

Recalling that the Governing Body at its 254th Session (November 1992) decided to place the item on the agenda of the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference as a general discussion item,

Having regard to the Employment Service Convention, 1948 (No. 88), and its accompanying Recommendation, 1948 (No. 83), as well as the Fee-Charging Employment Agencies Convention (Revised), 1949 (No. 96);

Takes note of the following conclusions and invites the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to request the Director-General to give due consideration to them:

[1] Adopted on 23 June 1994.

Conclusions concerning the role of private employment agencies in the functioning of labour markets

INTRODUCTION

1. The Committee discussed the role of private employment agencies in the functioning of labour markets against the background of widespread concern with unemployment and poverty. The ILO strived to make full and productive employment the top priority on the agenda of policy-makers. This social objective should be supported by public, economic and financial policies which enhance sustainable economic development. Developing countries were not alone in facing increasing difficulties to ensure that there was support for the unemployed, those out of the labour force, the working poor and those having to face poor conditions of work. Social and economic issues, as well as policy options, were closely interrelated and had both short- and longer-term dimensions. It was in this wider framework that the Committee had reviewed the contributions made by public and private employment agencies.

2. The Committee had grouped its conclusions under 12 headings ordered in sequence from A to L as follows: (A) definition of a well-functioning labour market; (B) labour-market policy and actors in the labour market; (C) the role of public employment services (PES); (D) definition and typology of private employment agencies (PREA); (E) place and role of PREA; (F) practices of PREA; (G) objective and scope of regulations; (H) means for sound practice by PREA other than traditional regulation; (I) relationship between PES and PREA; (J) the case for better and increased cooperation; (K) relevant ILO standards; (L) prospects for future ILO standards.

A. Definition of a well-functioning labour market

3. The deliberations in the Committee clearly showed that all those involved in the activities of the labour market – workers, their representatives, employers and governments – took great interest in the functioning of the labour market and were concerned about the developments and ongoing changes in that market. The Committee found that all these interests and concerns formed a solid basis for the pursuit of the goal of improving the functioning of labour markets throughout the world, to create new jobs, to help jobseekers to find suitable jobs so that they could support themselves and their families and to help employers to develop their businesses through the recruitment of skilled and suitable workers. The Committee also found that there was still total consent on the fundamental principle, laid down in the Constitution of the International Labour Organization, that labour is not a commodity and that the freedom of jobseekers to search for jobs and the right for employers to take decisions concerning the recruitment of workers were fundamental elements in free market and mixed economies. The Committee also stressed the principles of freedom of association and collective bargaining as well as the promotion of employment creation in an industrial relations context that was effective, and in which workers' rights were fully respected.

4. These principles, however, did not exclude the possibility that measures might be needed to improve the functioning of labour markets and to look closely into the present international standard, namely Fee-Charging Employment Agencies Convention (Revised), 1949 (No. 96). The Committee thoroughly discussed the activities of the labour market and examined in depth the actions of those who operated in the labour market.

5. There was general consent that labour markets were no longer stable, that changes in international and national economies had a great impact on labour markets and that there was a general acceleration in those changes which could have enormous consequences, both for enterprises and not least for workers and their families. The conditions which prevailed at the beginning of the twentieth century, and which influenced the labour standard under discussion in the Committee, no longer existed in most countries, whereas they were still present in others. There seemed to be a general worldwide trend to recognize the need to respond to change by employers, workers and governments when it came to forms of employment, interventions to influence the markets and the organization of workplaces.

6. Three fundamental functions could be identified in the labour market. First, it was a market-place where jobseekers and employers had the opportunity to find each other. Secondly, it was a source of information about jobseekers and vacancies which could be used by jobseekers, employers and governments to follow changes in the market in order to take necessary decisions concerning that market. Thirdly, it was a place where States could introduce the necessary programmes and incentives to influence the functioning of the market.

B. Labour-market policy and actors in the labour market

7. When looking at the labour market and its function as a market-place, the Committee found that a wide range of activities took place to help jobseekers and employers to find each other and conclude contracts of employment. In many countries, public employment agencies were predominant whereas private actors, both those working for profit and non-profit organizations, appeared more frequently in others. Very few countries seemed to comply with the general principles of Convention No. 96 that public agencies should be the rule and private employment agencies should be abolished as soon as possible.

8. The ILO report defined at least 16 different varieties of private employment agencies. It was clear that economic change would cause other kinds of agencies to develop in the future. The Committee recognized the freedom of employers, subject to national law and practice, to fulfil their recruitment needs through the use of these agencies.

9. The Committee also found that it was time to recognize the need for a wide variety of activities to be undertaken to help jobseekers and employers to find each other and to increase the activities on the market-place for jobs. Both public and private actors complemented each other in the market-place.

10. The Committee found, however, that it was a fundamental responsibility of States to see to it that the labour market was functioning well and to assume that responsibility by guaranteeing that there was an adequately-funded and well-functioning public employment service free of charge for jobseekers.

11. When it came to information about the labour market, the Committee found that it should be the responsibility of States to guarantee that information about jobseekers and vacancies was available to employers and workers, and that adequate statistical information existed to meet the need for action on the labour market. Whether the gathering and distribution of information should be public or private was not an issue to be determined by international labour standards, since traditions, legal frameworks and national practices varied between member States. In the upgrading of national employment market information systems and networking it seemed desirable, however, that the ILO and other international agencies should, upon request, provide assistance to developing countries and to those countries undergoing transformation to market economies. This would enable them to collect, analyse and disseminate accurate and timely labour market information in establishing and developing databanks.

12. The Committee firmly believed that States must take care to guarantee the right of individuals to have their personal integrity protected when information was processed on the labour market.

13. The Committee found that it was an important role for States, through employment programmes and other means, to influence the labour market in order to improve its functioning and facilitate employment for all jobseekers, including the unskilled and the vulnerable jobseekers such as workers with family responsibilities, on the basis of non-discrimination and freedom of access to the labour market. The importance of government activities to create new jobs and to improve possibilities for jobseekers and employers to enter into contracts of employment remained totally undisputed.

14. The background for the conclusions as drawn up by the Committee were further discussed in the following sections.

C. The role of public employment services (PES)

15. The Committee expressed its continuing support for the principles set out in Employment Services Convention, 1948 (No. 88), and, in particular, the duty of the employment services to ensure, where necessary, in cooperation with other public and private bodies concerned, the best possible organization of the labour market.

16. Having recognized this essential role, governments had generally given these services the financial and other means to plan and implement their labour-market policies. In order to implement these policies, they had mainly concentrated on placement, guidance, employment training, labour market information, programmes for job, skill and geographical mobility, promotion and management of subsidized employment schemes, unemployment insurance, etc. In some countries, these programmes had been placed under the responsibility of several public institutions but remained coordinated by the PES.

17. For a very long time some countries were split among those which proceeded on the assumption that the labour market worked best when it was managed exclusively by public entities, mainly the PES, and those which took the view that the labour market worked best when it permitted PREA to operate side by side with PES.

18. Standards adopted by the ILO on the subject in 1949 clearly showed that the predominant view was that the labour market works best in the absence, or with the very limited presence, of PREA. That view also seemed to have been supported by the number of governments which had ratified the relevant ILO Conventions in this field.

19. Given the dynamic conditions of the labour market in recent years, it had become clear that the growing role and place of well-functioning PREA could be positive and that the essential role played by the PES had been and must be maintained. It was the general view that only a public entity such as the PES could be made responsible for such functions as management of unemployment insurance, labour-market information, management of special programmes to lead the most vulnerable jobseekers to the threshold of employability, and the management of subsidized job-promotion schemes.

20. For those reasons, the Committee believed that any consideration of the role and functions of PREA would be incomplete if considered in isolation from those of PES or outside the context of an effective labour market policy. Moreover, in view of their overall responsibilities for the labour market, the Committee found that some States might want to maintain a monopoly in those functions which they considered appropriate.

D. Definition and typology of private employment agencies (PREA)

21. PREA may be defined as private firms directly or indirectly providing a service in the labour market. The definition proposed in Chapter 2 of the ILO report could be considered as being both too extensive and too restrictive when referring to specific national conditions. Similarly, only national situations could give precise substance to the notion of private, which could relate to the nature of the capital, the type of law governing its activities or to whether the agency was profit or non-profit making. However, the definition in the ILO report was a useful reference for national circumstances.

22. Similar considerations applied concerning the typology proposed in the ILO report. In some countries some of the agencies listed were irrelevant or non-existent, or classified as service firms outside the employment field. In other countries, PREA were grouped into two categories, those providing a service (brokers or otherwise) in a one-to-one contractual relationship and those establishing a triangular contractual relationship, such as in the case of temporary work agencies. In other countries a legal distinction was made according to whether agencies, whatever their activity, were profit or non-profit making. The Committee considered it useful, however, for the ILO to continue to build on the classification provided in the report in order to make available for permanent future reference, at the request of governments, employers or workers organizations, an updated description of the agencies contained in the typology. This should not, however, preclude the pursuit of a more generic approach of describing PREA when considering a revised standard.

23. Temporary work agencies were one of the major types of firms mentioned in the ILO typology. The role that these agencies played in the market, the very particular nature of the triangular relationship which they entered into, and the legal problems deriving therefrom, explained why some governments had enacted special laws to regulate their activities. In some of these cases temporary work agencies were dealt with as quite distinct agencies.

24. The Committee considered that certain types of agency that were scarcely mentioned in the ILO report, and which operated in markets of developing countries, deserved special attention and possible regulation by national governments in relation to abuses which are committed, particularly in the case of contract labour agencies which hire home workers for processing particular goods (e.g. cigarette rolling, hides, etc.) or those that charge fees from jobseekers in exchange for the promise of employment abroad. These agencies should be considered in any future ILO discussion of private employment agencies.

E. Place and role of PREA

25. The Committee acknowledged that in a rapidly changing world, PREA had increased spectacularly in size and importance and had acquired growing recognition as important elements in labour markets.

26. The Committee concluded that well-functioning PREA could most certainly contribute to the effective functioning of the labour market. PREA could in many instances:

- reduce the time needed to fill vacancies;
- bring vacancies to the surface in the open market;
- sense changes in labour-market requirements and react quickly, avoiding delays and imbalances;
- match supply and demand of skills through relevant selection and recruitment methods, thus saving waste due to avoidable manpower turnover;
- satisfy needs not satisfactorily covered by public agencies due to the growing complexity in demand and supply of skills;
- build a bridge between unemployment and permanent employment by providing, mainly through temporary work assignments, gradual incorporation of jobseekers (especially new entrants or re-entrants) into the labour market;
- multiply the sources of information on job opportunities, thus increasing the overall stock of available information on the job market;
- reduce the time of deployment from one job to the other through outplacement techniques, thus contributing to a better labour force mobility;
- provide short-term employment training thus contributing to bridge the gap between the supply and demand of skills.

27. Overall, PREA activities added value to the labour market as marketplace forces had shown through the growing demand for the services they provided. The fact that the activities of PREA had grown in quantity and quality and that governments had acknowledged that growth in their legislation, as shown in Chapter 3 of the ILO Report dealing with this question, were indicators of their contribution to the formation of wealth and of the value attributed by the market to the services offered by these agencies.

28. The Committee also noted that both workers' and employers' organizations might operate successfully as PREA.

F. Practices of PREA

29. The Committee acknowledged the fact that there were numerous concerns regarding the ethics of PREA, and that PREA were sometimes singled out for poor practices in relation to the interests of workers and jobseekers. During the Committee's deliberations this perception was frequently directed at temporary work agencies (TWAs). Whatever the circumstances, the behaviour of PREA called for rules to prevent or discourage them from engaging in conduct or practices that undermined workers' rights, be they in the areas of wages, general conditions of work, industrial relations or safety and health.

30. Misconduct in the field of employment must be underscored because it was there that people's jobs and people's professional lives were at stake. Means must be available to deal with PREA which were found to be in violation of laws and regulations.

31. The circumstances in which PREA operated and the employment relationships they entered into with jobseekers could often lead to exploitation and improper conduct. The Committee had listened to allegations from Workers' members describing how some PREA had circumvented laws to help employers reduce workers' wages, to render trade union organization difficult or impossible, to ignore regulations concerning equal opportunities, to avoid paying benefits to which workers were legally entitled and to aid in the process of replacing permanent with temporary jobs.

32. The Committee's recognition of the importance and relevance of the role of PREA in labour markets should in no way be interpreted as an endorsement of any infringements they might commit of the laws that exist to protect workers' rights and interests. If new international standards were to be drawn up on this subject, special care should be taken to include provisions ensuring adequate protection against such abuses for workers and jobseekers alike to the extent that these were not guaranteed by other ILO standards.

33. Special attention should be given to those agencies which did placements abroad due to the serious consequences of some unfair practices for both workers and employers.

G. Objective and scope of regulations

34. The Committee acknowledged that PREA should not and might not wish to operate in an environment without rules. The Committee agreed that there might be several sources of rules governing the activities of PREA. These possible sources were: common business law, labour law, business and labour jurisprudence, collective agreements, specific laws and rules dealing with PREA, professional codes of conduct adopted by associations of PREA, internal rules of these agencies as well as ILO Conventions and Recommendations.

35. Each national context determined the nature of the rules governing PREA. The mix of rules originating from different sources depended on the maturity of the labour market, the culture and behaviour of its actors, existing traditions and practice in collective bargaining, etc. In some labour markets, when the risk of unprofessional behaviour was high, specific rules directed at PREA and the adoption of a licensing system might be recommended. In others, where a tradition of fair practice was well established, common business law complemented by codes of professional ethics could form a satisfactory regulatory framework. In others still, collective agreements could provide a reliable legal basis.

36. The Committee was well aware of the dangers of over-regulation. The worst that could happen was for PREA to be governed by several redundant, incompatible or contradictory rules emanating from different legal sources. For example, a law on the protection of confidentiality and a specific law on some PREA could be contradictory in regulating the treatment of computerized personal files. Similarly, different PREA competing in the same segment of the market and offering similar services could be regulated by different laws: common business law for one, a specific law for the other.

37. The general approach that the Committee supported was for governments to adopt a pragmatic attitude concerning the regulation of PREA. Governments should rely on the laws and rules in force, whenever possible, before considering specific regulations.

38. In all cases, regulations concerning PREA should be designed in consultation with representatives of the business concerned and with workers' organizations.

H. Means for sound practice by PREA other than traditional regulations

39. The Committee recognized that governments might seek other means than the traditional legal or regulatory instruments to establish fair practice by those who had a role in the labour market. Some of these means consisted in setting common professional codes of conduct governing the following: professionals from the public or private sectors dealing with jobseekers; certification of the profession of employment adviser (in the same way as was done in some countries for translators or accountants); common job classification within the employment service sector, as well as social partner-based councils to discuss policy and performance.

40. Similarly, the Committee believed that both PES and PREA could agree, in a more or less formal way, on common standards of fair practice such as the fair use of appropriate selection tests, vacancy advertisements, interviewing and investigation methods prior to hiring.

I. Relationship between PES and PREA

41. In many countries PES and PREA tended to operate separately. PES were generally available to all jobseekers and served in particular the disadvantaged and the lower-skilled jobseekers. PREA addressed the market of the rare, specialized or higher skills where prior selection was crucial to hiring, the temporary job market, or specific segments of the market requiring particular services such as outplacement. Overlapping on the same market by PES and PREA was more the exception than the rule.

42. The Committee believed that there was scope for increased cooperation between the PES and PREA. Many PES could not afford to enter into direct competition, even where such competition might be beneficial. PES must, however, endeavour to offer the best range of services possible, in order to ensure that they fulfilled their social duties towards all jobseekers, including the disadvantaged, and offered the common employer a means to satisfy his staffing needs. Labour-market cooperation between all the actors would assist in the provision of the broadest scope of services.

43. For this relationship to work effectively, the Committee would, for the most part, agree that fee charging by PES would not apply in relation to access to job vacancies.

J. The case for better and increased cooperation

44. The Committee expressed its firm support for all attempts to establish permanent cooperation between PES and PREA. It was indeed the Committee's opinion that cooperation was a desirable institutional form of behaviour.

45. Cooperation between public institutions and private employment firms was not normally established by law. Rather, it was the result of tradition, administrative culture and behaviour by all actors in the labour market.

46. Yet, measures could be taken by governments to promote cooperation. For example, the practice of using private firms to implement labour-market schemes could lead to more and better cooperation. Similarly, the decision to advertise vacancies in each other's premises, or to allow mutual access to computerized vacancy files could also be conducive to improved working relations. In some countries, inviting staff from PREA to specialized training or seminars conducted by PES can develop a spirit of cooperation and understanding. Exchanging staff or sharing premises can be other unconventional and efficient ways of building beneficial personal contacts among staff of both organizations.

47. In general, cooperation could best be achieved when the PES recognized its value and coordinated with PREA to build the broadest possible spectrum of programmes.

48. For some countries a network of PREA complementing the activities of the PES could best be established through joint planning, delegation of specific duties and sharing of information.

K. Relevant ILO standards

49. Three main ILO standards dealt, directly or indirectly, with the activities of PREA. These were the Employment Services Convention, 1948 (No. 88), and its corresponding Recommendation No. 83 and the Fee-Charging Employment Agencies Convention (Revised), 1949 (No. 96).

50. Most Committee members found that the principles underlying Convention No. 96 were not relevant to their national situations. It appeared obvious that this Convention had been adopted in line with the provisions contained in the previous standard adopted on this question, namely the Fee-Charging Employment Agencies Convention, 1933 (No. 34), which openly opposed these institutions. The overt objective of Convention No. 96 was either to ban PREA or to place them under tight supervision by government authorities. As suggested in the preceding sections of this document, the Committee believed that all these principles, except the one referred to in paragraph 53 below, no longer corresponded to today's reality in modern labour markets.

51. Part II of Convention No. 96 appeared to be removed from current practice in most labour markets. The Committee was convinced that the four recent denunciations of this part of the Convention were only partial evidence of a more general loss of credibility toward the contents of this part of the standard.

52. Part III of Convention No. 96 in a number of respects did not reflect current realities: narrow scope (only the job brokerage service was considered); inflexible type of supervision (only the licensing system was envisaged); constraining (yearly renewal of licenses) or obsolete provisions in regard to current functioning of modern labour markets (notification to supervisory authority of fees charged to clients).

53. The Committee believed, however, that one provision contained in Convention No. 96 should be maintained, namely that concerning the payment of services offered by PREA. It was indeed essential to recall that, with very few exceptions such as services provided to high-level professionals and executives, the Committee remained in favour of the principle that fees should not be charged to the jobseeker.

L. Prospects for future ILO standards

54. The Committee held the view that the ILO should proceed to revise Convention No. 96.

55. It was the Committee's view that the revised standard should pursue the following objectives:

- set the pattern for response to the dynamics of changing labour-market functions and recall the role of its actors;
- draw up general parameters to describe the main actors, namely, the PES and PREA, as well as the nature of the relationship both between themselves and with their clients;
- establish general principles and provide guidance that protect:
  (i) labour markets against poor and unethical practices;
  (ii) workers' interests including where the stability of industrial relations' systems might be affected by some practices of PREA (these principles should consider the concerns of some (but not all) Committee members with regard to triangular employment relationships, including contract labour, TWAs and staff-leasing arrangements);
  (iii) workers recruited in one country for work in another;
- create environments that allow for the improved functioning of all employment agencies;
- ensure that national governments would be free to determine how the above objectives would be met.

VI

Resolutions concerning the assessment of contributions of new member States[1]

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

Decides, in accordance with article 9, paragraph 2, of the Financial Regulations, that the contribution of South Africa to the ILO budget for the period of its membership in the Organization in 1994 be based on an annual assessment rate of 0.40 per cent.

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

Decides, in accordance with article 9, paragraph 2, of the Financial Regulations, that the rates of assessment of the contributions of Georgia, Tajikistan and Turkmenistan for 1994 be 0.21 per cent, 0.05 per cent and 0.06 per cent respectively.

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

In accordance with article 9, paragraph 2, of the Financial Regulations:

(a) decides that the contributions of Eritrea and the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia for the periods of their membership in the Organization in 1993 be based on annual assessment rates of 0.01 per cent and 0.02 per cent respectively, and that the resulting assessment for 1993 of the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia be deducted from that of Yugoslavia for 1993;

(b) decides that the rates of assessment for 1994 of Eritrea and the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia be 0.01 per cent and 0.02 per cent respectively and that the rate of assessment of the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia be deducted from that of Yugoslavia for 1994 of 0.16 per cent.

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

In accordance with article 9, paragraph 2, of the Financial Regulations:

(a) decides that the contributions of the Czech Republic and Slovakia for their periods of membership in the Organization in 1993 be based on annual assessment rates of 0.42 per cent and 0.13 per cent respectively;

(b) decides that the total credits that were due to the former Czechoslovakia in 1993 of 267,332 Swiss francs be allocated to the Czech Republic and Slovakia as credits against their assessments for the periods of their membership in 1993 proportionate to their respective rates of assessment for 1993 proposed in subparagraph (a);

(c) decides that the definitive rates of assessment of the Czech Republic and Slovakia for the year 1994 be 0.42 per cent and 0.13 per cent respectively;

(d) decides that the total credits due to the former Czechoslovakia of 2,109 Swiss francs in 1994 and 1,230 Swiss francs in 1995 be allocated to the Czech Republic and Slovakia as credits against their assessments for the 1994 and 1995 years proportionate to their respective rates of assessment for those years.

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

Decides, in accordance with article 9, paragraph 2, of the Financial Regulations, that the contribution of Oman to the ILO budget for the period of its membership in the Organization in 1994 be based on an annual assessment rate of 0.03 per cent.

VII

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

Decides, in accordance with article 9, paragraph 2, of the Financial Regulations, to adopt the draft scale of assessments for the 1995 year as set out in column 3 (headed "Percentage 1995") of Appendix I to this report.

VIII

Resolution concerning an arrangement for the settlement of amounts due by Viet Nam[1]

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

Having regard to paragraph 7 of article 10 of the Financial Regulations,

Approves the arrangement with the Government of Viet Nam for the settlement of the amount of 182,960 Swiss francs due in respect of its previous period of membership of the ILO by the payment of 15 annual instalments made up of 14 equal annual instalments of 12,190 Swiss francs and a final fifteenth instalment of 12,300 Swiss francs, beginning in 1993.

---

IX

Resolution concerning an arrangement for the settlement of amounts due by Albania[1]

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

Having regard to paragraph 7 of article 10 of the Financial Regulations;

Accepts the proposal of the Government of Albania for the settlement of the amount of 135,142 Swiss francs due in respect of its previous period of membership of the ILO by the payment of 12 annual instalments made up of 11 equal annual instalments of 11,262 Swiss francs and a final twelfth instalment of 11,260 Swiss francs, and agrees that this arrangement should come into force retroactively as from 1 January 1994, with the first of the 12 annual instalments being payable in 1994.

X

Resolution concerning the Financial Report and Audited Financial Statements for 1992-93[1]

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization;

Decides, in accordance with article 29 of the Financial Regulations, to adopt the Financial Report and Audited Financial Statements for 1992-93.

XI

Resolution concerning the treatment of the 1992-93 cash surplus[1]

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

Noting that for the 1992-93 biennium an excess of regular budget income over regular budget expenditure has resulted in a cash surplus of 24,230,334 Swiss francs (equivalent to $16,710,574 at the 1994-95 budget rate of exchange of 1.45 Swiss francs to the US dollar);

Decides, as an exceptional one-time measure and in derogation of article 18 of the Financial Regulations, to finance expenditure itemized in Appendix IV to the First Report of the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee (reproduced as Appendix II to this Report), amounting to 21,729,700 Swiss francs from the cash surplus, thereby reducing by a corresponding amount the sum which would otherwise be available for reducing member States' contributions for 1994-95,

Notes that, taking into account the above appropriation, the amount available under article 18 of the Financial Regulations for reducing the assessed contributions of member States for 1995 will be 2,500,634 Swiss francs.

XII

Resolution concerning the treatment of the amount received from the Compagnie Générale de Climatisation et de Maintenance[1]

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization;

Decides, in derogation of article 11.1 of the Financial Regulations, that the amount of 3,668,185 Swiss francs received from the Compagnie Générale de Climatisation et de Maintenance be paid into the Building and Accommodation Fund for the maintenance of the headquarters building's technical installations.

---

XIII

Resolution concerning the composition of the Administrative Tribunal of the International Labour Organization[1]

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

In accordance with article III of the Statute of the Administrative Tribunal of the International Labour Organization;

Decides to extend the terms of office of Sir William Douglas (Barbados), Mr. Edilbert Razafindralambo (Madagascar), and Mr. José Maria Ruda (Argentina) as judges by a further period of three years, with effect from June 1994.
